nating these officers from the Lord Chancellor, as proposed by the clause, to the Judge of the court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had placed the power in the Lord Chancellor's hands, as he objected to giving it to the chief Judge.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy had large salaries and little to do. He recollected being upon a Committee which recommended that the number of these officers should be curtailed. At that time there were seven registrars, and the number had continued to be seven ever since. The next clause provided that the number of these officers might be increased if need be, and he thought that there ought to be a clause declaring that the number might be reduced if need be.

MR. ROEBUCK remarked that by doing away with the official assignees they would put an end to a great improvement effected by a past Bill. In his opinion the Bill was an attorney's Bill, and that the official assignees were done away with in order to forward the interests of the attorneys.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL stated that the duties of the registrars would be considerably increased by the Bill. They would be constantly employed, and would be the means of saving a great deal of the expense and delay now attending the Bankruptcy Court. Still, while power was taken to increase their number there should also be a power to reduce it, and by another clause that power was given.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he believed that the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock was under some misapprehension as to the existing number of registrars.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 75 and 76.

Clause 77 (Appointment and Payment of a Substitute during Temporary Absence of Commissioner or Registrar).

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he should move the insertion of words providing that the amount paid to the deputy in such a case shall be deducted from the salary of the officer in whose absence he shall act.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought the Committee had gone far enough in this direction, and that in common charity and kindness the House ought to allow the salary of the deputy in such cases as were contemplated by the clause.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, they ought to be just before they were generous. The principle of the clause—that of providing substitutes for public officers, to be paid out of public money—was entirely new. If adopted it might be extended in future to the army and navy, and even to the gentleman who was known to be the Attorney General's principal aid, but whose name was described generally in terms more forcible than polite. A salary might hereafter be demanded for him.

MR. MURRAY said that a provision was introduced into the Bill brought forward last Session by the noble Lord the Member for the City (Lord J. Russell) which required the payment of substitutes out of the salaries of those for whom they acted.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he also believed the principle to be entirely a new one. There was no difficulty in the legal profession in finding a substitute in cases of illness. He moved the omission of all the words in the clause after the word "Act."

Amendment proposed, in page 16, line 39, to leave out from the word "Act," to the end of the Clause.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought that the fact that the registrars would have to pay for the substitutes would greatly conduce to their health, and he therefore hoped the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock would persist in his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was no use to expect the House of Commons to be humane and generous, when they were imbued with the spirit of economy. He had pledged himself to adopt the provisions of the noble Lord's Bill. He was sorry to find the words which had been read in the Bill, and he should reluctantly withdraw from his intention of dividing the Committee.

MR. WALPOLE said, he was obliged to take the unpopular side, as he was in favour of the clause as it stood. In other parts of the Bill it was provided that the registrars should attend every day in the year, with the exception of Christmas Day, fast days, and holidays. He would, therefore, appeal to the justice of the Committee, and ask whether persons, so occupied, ought not to be provided with some relief; especially in the case of illness, or any other reasonable cause. In the case of the Commissioners, the Committee had very properly refused to pay for a substitute for them during their vacation; but where a clerk was required to attend every day, and through sickness was rendered unable to attend for a few days, he thought it hard that a substitute should be paid out of his salary.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, it was the first time he had ever heard of stopping the salary of a Judge in the event of illness, and a higher power appointing another person to receive the amount so confiscated.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he should support the Amendment. If a clergyman were ill, he had to pay for a substitute out of his small stipend. If a recorder were ill, he had no substitute provided by the State; and as a recorder himself, he should be ashamed to ask the Government to pay for his deputy. If for illness, or other reasonable cause, another Commissioner or Registrar could be appointed at the public expense, it would lead to great abuse.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 117: Majority 10.

On Question that the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,

MR. CLAY said, he should take the sense of the Committee on the Question, with a view to negative the Clause. The registrars would then stand in the same position as recorders and others.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would not have introduced this provision, had it not been to secure the constant administration of justice, and to prevent any of the courts being shut up in the absence of a Commissioner or Registrar, on account of illness, or other urgent reason. He believed that the provision met that exigency in a satisfactory manner; but he could not consent to its adoption, except in its original form. He trusted that the Committee, having struck out the provision for the payment of a substitute, would omit the clause altogether. He should certainly take the sense of the House on that question.

MR. WHITESIDE remarked that, under the Irish Bankruptcy Law, the Lord Chancellor had power, if an official was not able to attend the court, to appoint a deputy, and assign the sum which he was to receive out of the salary of the gentleman whose place he filled. Such was the actual state of the case; although the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) had shown good reasons why it ought not to be so.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, it was very easy for the hon. and learned Attorney General to speak of the House of Commons being seized with a fit of economy, and to be generous at the expense of the public. But he should remember that it was a common thing at present for a Commissioner of Bankruptcy or a Police Magistrate to sit for a brother official; and there was no reason why the same custom should not prevail under this Act. He feared the payment of deputies would lead to great abuses.
[Second Night.]

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that the hon. and learned Attorney General had just shown something of the same temper in giving up this clause that he had displayed the other day, when defeated on another part of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman really must not expect that 150 or 160 Gentlemen, however great the deference and respect they might be disposed to pay to his opinion, were to be absolutely guided by his judgment on every minute point of the Bill. They would form opinions for themselves and would act on those opinions, even in opposition to him. His hon. and learned Friend possessed greater experience than he did—probably on all subjects but one, and that was the difficulty of working a very long Bill through the House. Perhaps he would allow him, therefore, to warn him that he would not accomplish that operation unless he endeavoured to consult and conciliate those who were opposed to him. The provision now in question was merely the re-enactment of a clause in an existing Act, with the addition of the “tail-piece,” which the Committee had just struck out. It was only an enabling clause to authorize the Lord Chancellor to appoint a deputy for a Commissioner or Registrar; and it was very unreasonable for the hon. and learned Attorney General to ask the Committee to take altogether from the Lord Chancellor the power of appointing a deputy, because the Amendment had been carried. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would reconsider the matter.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he had never heard a more unreasonable or unjust attack than that of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie), and he was sure he could not have been in the House in the early part of the evening. The right hon. Gentleman had, from one circumstance, pronounced an opinion which those hon. Members who had been in attendance the whole evening knew to be unsound. He could himself bear witness to the fact that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, five or six times in the course of the evening, had, in the most conciliatory manner, yielded to representations and adopted suggestions coming from both sides of the House.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought it would be better to pass the clause than expunge it. If one of the Judges wanted a fortnight's holiday, or wished to be married, it was only reasonable he should apply to the Lord Chancellor and obtain the appointment of a deputy for the brief interval.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he held that, as the money part of the clause was struck out, it would be right to strike out the clause itself.

MR. PULLER said, he should like to know for whose benefit this clause was to be struck out. He thought it not desirable to bind men to the wheel so tightly, and he should oppose the striking out of the clause.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he would recommend the Attorney General to follow the analogy of the Irish Acts. There were two sets of precedents in Ireland. By the County Judge Acts the Lord Chancellor could appoint a deputy to the Judge and assign him a portion of his salary; but by the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Acts the Lord Chancellor could give the deputy all the powers and the salary of the principal. The Attorney General would do well to adopt the latter principle in the present Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock he wished to say that he was not aware he had ever shown any indisposition to deal with the arguments urged against the Bill. The Committee, however, had quarrelled with the Attorney General, because he would not accept their Amendments. He, on his part, did not quarrel with their opinion. If they had the power to carry their views against him that power must be enforced. But why did the Committee quarrel with him? He thought he heard no reason given for an opposition that had lost him a night, and cost him two divisions. The only cause he could give for the opposition of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) was that he did not like to see the Attorney General have his own way. From communications received from the right hon. Gentleman that evening he thought there was peace between them. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman liked war he was ready to meet him. But, when the right hon. Gentleman boasted of his skill and experience, he (the Attorney General) needed not to be vainglorious, but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the House sat in 1857 until late in August to pass a Bill that was advocated by the Attorney General. So much for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock. To pass to a more important matter, he thought it unkind, unreasonable, and impolitic to impose upon a sick Judge the obligation to appoint a deputy, whom he would have to pay. ["No!"] That, at all events, was the object of the words, "which deputy he is to pay." He could not consent to follow the Irish precedent quoted by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and he must, therefore, give the Committee the trouble of dividing.

Mr. Edwin James

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to inquire whether the interpretation put by the Attorney General upon this clause was correct? By the clause the Lord Chancellor had the power to appoint a deputy, but he had no power to pay him, or to make the registrar pay him. Therefore, if the Lord Chancellor appointed a barrister it would be without the slightest possibility of paying him.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he had been under the impression that it was intended to propose the omission of the last two lines of the clause, in order to propose the insertion of other words, to the effect that the Lord Chancellor, after appointing a deputy, was to have the right to pay him out of the salary of the person in whose place he was appointed. He would sooner see the clause struck out than such an insertion adopted. It was now proposed, however, to maintain the clause with the omission of the last two lines, and then the Lord Chancellor would have the power of appointing a substitute, but no power of paying him. Therefore no substitute would be appointed except by the request of the Judge, and if the Committee agreed to let the clause go in that form he saw no harm in it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he also had spoken under the same impression, that it was intended to insert other words substituting the power to pay the deputy out of the Judge's salary. If, however, it was proposed to leave the clause as it stood after the omission, he should not object to it.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. ROEBUCK moved that the Chairman report progress.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he wished to make his peace with the Attorney General. He had not intended to say anything personally offensive to the hon. and learned Gentleman, from whom he had received much personal courtesy. If the House wished to make real progress with a Bill there was no hour like that between 12 P.M. and 1 o'clock A.M.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he believed that the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock had given the House the benefit of his attendance at 10 o'clock. For himself, however, he had been in the House since noon. Human nature would not bear such long and late hours, and as his (Mr. Roebuck) was a very feeble human nature, he had moved that the Chairman report progress.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he wished to know when the hon. and learned Attorney General proposed to go on again with the Bill. The Committee were approaching the 150th Clause, which raised a question of principle—namely, how far it was desirable to extend the bankruptcy law to persons not traders. The principle was of such general importance, that it was desirable to discuss it at an evening, and not at a morning sitting.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he hoped they would proceed with the Bill on Thursday morning. The more important portions of the Bill, relating to the extension of bankruptcy, would be reserved for the evening sittings; but the ordinary clauses could be proceeded with at the morning sittings.

MR. HENLEY said, he doubted whether anything would be gained by taking up the Bill at a morning sitting. It was straining the working powers of the House too much to have three morning sittings in the week. There were so many hon. Members engaged on Committees and in the law courts that to go on with the Bill at morning sittings would be tantamount to passing it through almost at the dictation of the Attorney General.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that in a Bill of that magnitude there were necessarily matters of great importance, and others of lesser moment. The latter might with advantage be proceeded with in the mornings, and those of greater importance postponed for the consideration of the House in the evenings. He hoped, therefore, that the House would go on, on Thursday morning, with those portions of the Bill to which no great exception was taken.

[Second Night.]

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE reminded the Committee that the time for again taking up the Bill could only be fixed when the Speaker was in the chair.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE expressed a hope that so important a Bill would not be fixed for Thursday morning. There were clauses in it that would require the serious consideration of all the Members of the House, and many could not be present at a morning sitting.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could only repeat what he had before said, that when they came to important questions on which a difference of opinion prevailed, those questions could be reserved for the evenings.

MR. WHITESIDE said, there were important questions coming before the House on Thursday evening, to which they would be expected to devote all their energies, and in these circumstances he objected to this Bill being proceeded with at a morning sitting on that day.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House will, upon Thursday next, at Twelve of the clock, again resolve itself into the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 135; Noes 66: Majority 69.

House adjourned, at half after
Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, July 10, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Indemnity; Mines Regulation and Inspection; Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (1845) Amendment; Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment; Burial Grounds (Ireland) Act (1856) Amendment; Bleaching and Dyeing Works; Titles to Land (Scotland) Act (1858) Amendment.

2nd Railway Cheap Trains, &c.; Augmentation of Small Benefices (Ireland); Universities and College Estates; Phoenix Park.

3rd Local Boards of Health, &c.

MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS IN SYRIA.

LORD STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE: My Lords, before the House proceeds to the business on the paper I should wish to ask some questions of the noble Lord who

Viscount Palmerston

more immediately represents the Foreign Department in this House, in relation to a subject which has only to be mentioned to excite the deepest sympathy. The subject to which I allude is that of the massacres which appear to have lately taken place in Syria, and to which the great journal of this country that appeared this morning, in its own emphatic and truly national tone, particularly directed the attention of the public. I have endeavoured, in the short time which has elapsed since the intelligence was first received, to obtain some information as to the circumstances, which cannot be deemed unworthy of your Lordships' attention. At the same time, although I took the precaution yesterday, in a private manner, to apprise the noble Lord of my intention to put certain questions to him, I shall not enter fully into so extensive and important a subject now, as perhaps, from the shortness of the time and my inability to give exact information as to the questions that I was about to ask, the noble Lord may not be prepared to give as complete an answer as the subject requires. Your Lordships are aware that the country in which these massacres are reported to have taken place is one which forms an important part of the Turkish empire, and to which, historically and politically, very momentous considerations are attached. The country is of a very peculiar nature, being entirely of a mountainous district and inhabited by tribes of very imperfect civilization, who are more separated from each other by religious animosities and more exposed to violent collisions in consequence than even the inhabitants of other parts of Turkey, where such causes of discord and mutual excitement are at all times ready enough to break into flame. Your Lordships will remember that at an antecedent period the country was occupied by the Pasha of Egypt; and it is only fair to say—though Her Majesty's forces mainly contributed, for political reasons, to restore it to Turkey—that Mehemet Ali, during the time he possessed it, appears to have governed it in a manner calculated to give more security to the inhabitants than any which they have enjoyed of late. The principal tribes are the Druses, of Pagan origin, who generally profess the Mahomedan creed, and add to the prejudices of religion a character marked with no small degree of ferocity; and the Maronites, who, as your Lordships know, are Christians, but, in spite of their Christianity, act from time to time with little regard for humanity in their disputes among themselves and with their neighbours. The other tribes, such as the Motualis and Yezidis, are of less political weight and very inferior in numbers. The Druses, by their religion, have the most intimate relations with the Turkish Government, while the Maronites, being Christians, have looked at all times more to the Christian Powers, and especially to France, whose Government, from an early period, by its tradition, policy, and common faith, has been considered their more immediate protector—to say nothing of the interests founded on its commercial establishments in Mount Lebanon. It appears that in the month of May last an attack was made by the Druses on a place near the coast named Beit Meri, a Maronite village, where acts of violence and bloodshed had been previously perpetrated, to the destruction of a considerable number of the inhabitants. More recently the Druses, increased in numbers by reinforcements from the Kurds and Bedouin tribes in the neighbourhood, collected in considerable force, and attacked in succession several large towns, perpetrating acts of the greatest atrocity. I am told that women and children were included in a common slaughter with the men, until in some instances scarce a living soul was left. They subsequently marched on Zahleh, a town at no great distance from the Mediterranean coast and the city of Beyrout. In addition to these destructive operations, what immensely increases the painful interest of the subject is that, not contented with all these horrors of plunder and butchery, they have surrounded Damascus, and, as I understand, have threatened to take possession of that place. The Christians there are very naturally in the last stage of anxiety and alarm. The circumstances thus brought under your Lordships' consideration are not only such as to interest deeply our feelings of humanity, but they evidently involve political consequences of the deepest moment. France, if she has not a positive right, has the strongest motives for interfering and taking a strenuous part in the repression of these enormous outrages. I learn from the public prints that the French Government have already announced to the Porte their intention to interfere with decision for the purpose of preventing any repetition of these outrages and for the protection of their own subjects and the Christians in general throughout Syria. I am assured that they have given the Porte to understand that if the Turkish authorities do not put down those disturbances France is prepared to operate with her own strong hand, and to obtain justice without further delay or hesitation. There is another consideration, too, which enhances the importance of the question, and that is the movements—I mean the diplomatic movements—of Russia in reference to the Christians of other parts of the Turkish empire. If anything more were wanting to give importance of the deepest character to the subject I have brought forward it is supplied by the rumours which are afloat as to the existence of some understanding between the two great Powers of the Continent who are most disposed to take an active interest in the affairs of Turkey. It appears to me that on all these grounds it is of the utmost consequence that Her Majesty's Government should adopt with immediate promptitude that line of conduct which is best calculated not only to serve the cause of humanity but to provide for those political interests which might be so seriously compromised by delay, indifference, or mistake. My long experience of the affairs of Turkey inclines me to ask whether the Turkish authorities have shown themselves sufficiently alert in meeting the danger which threatens the security of those who are so immediately entitled to their constant and efficient protection. I feel assured that your Lordships will be grievously sorry to find any grounds for supposing that any remissness on the part of the Turkish authorities has been the cause of outrages which all must unite in deploring, and still more so if there were reason to suspect them of positive connivance. I should myself be slow to entertain any suspicion of the kind; but I must say that there are circumstances, not yet confirmed or proved, which seem to open a door for some distrust on the subject, and at all events to furnish an additional reason for desiring to ascertain from Her Majesty's Government the real state of the case, and for pressing upon them the importance of bringing the Porte and its subordinate authorities to a sense of their duty, not only towards their own subjects, but towards the great Christian Powers who interfered at such a sacrifice of blood and treasure to preserve them from a great danger. I cannot conceal from myself that an Empire which has been confessed to exist politically on sufferance has a paramount duty to perform towards its allies, as well as towards its own subjects. It does, I confess, appear to me that, whatever suspicions we may have entertained in former times with regard to the intentions of Russia, and however we may have acted for the repression of her apparent disposition to interfere too much with the Porte's independence, it is exactly in proportion to our own interference on that subject that we are bound, as one of the principal Powers of Europe, to see that justice be done to the Christian subjects of the Porte—aye, and to their Mussulman subjects too—and that the security which has been given to the Turkish Government by the Treaty of 1856 be not made use of as a screen for their negligence and for the faults of administration which allow of the perpetration of atrocities such as those which it has been my painful duty to describe. It would be out of season on this occasion to enter more in detail into the subject to the principal points of which I think I have called your Lordships' attention; but reserving to myself the right of bringing the matter specially before the House, after receiving the answer of my noble Friend, I beg leave to put to him the following Questions, which I trust he will be able to answer in satisfactory terms—whether any official accounts confirming the rumour of massacres lately perpetrated on the Christian population in sundry parts of Syria have been received by Her Majesty's Government, and, if so, when, and up to what date, they were received? whether Her Majesty's Government intend to lay any part of the information in question on the table of the House, and in that case when? whether Her Majesty's Government have taken any and what steps, either singly or in concert with other Powers, for the protection of the Christians, and in particular of Her Majesty's subjects in Syria? and whether any information has reached Her Majesty's Government to the effect that the French Ambassador at Constantinople has been directed by M. Thouvenel to announce to the Porte that France is bound to put a stop to the massacre of the Christians in Syria?

Before sitting down I wish to allude to an expression which fell from my noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) last night in reference to a matter which affects very nearly the principle involved in the subject which I have had the honour of bringing before your Lordships to-night. My noble

Lord Stratford de Redcliffe

Friend, in his natural and praiseworthy zeal against violence and inhumanity, especially when they take the form of a tyrannical Government, treated the great principles of international law, which are so closely connected with this and many other subjects affecting the interests of Europe and civilization, in a manner which rather surprised me, coming from such a source. I should be glad, therefore, to afford my noble and learned Friend an opportunity of expressing himself more completely with reference to the value and importance of sustaining the principle of international law, notwithstanding the great provocation which may occasionally be given by misguided persons.

LORD WODEHOUSE: My Lords, I am afraid that, as my noble Friend did not furnish me with a copy of the exact questions which he meant to ask, I may not be able to answer all of them as precisely as I should have wished; but with regard to the general question of what information the Government have received from Syria, I am sorry to say that I can confirm entirely the lamentable accounts which he has given of the events which have taken place there. Despatches received yesterday, of a recent date—I cannot call to mind what is the latest, but I remember one despatch was dated the 18th of last month—describe a state of things than which nothing can be more miserable, or more deserving the compassion of all Christian nations. The principal places at which these outrages have taken place are Hasbeiya and Zahleh. At Hasbeiya the principal Christians were congregated together, and, having been induced by the Turkish authorities to lay down their arms, they were next day attacked by the Druses, and a large portion of them massacred in the presence of the Turkish troops in the place, who do not appear to have interfered. Your Lordships have probably seen in the newspapers accounts of this massacre, but it is stated in one of the despatches that a considerable number of the Christians had escaped; and we, therefore, have reason to hope that the massacre was not so general as has been represented. It seems that this massacre was not confined merely to the Christians, but that the chief of the Druses, who had command on that occasion, took the opportunity to revenge himself on some Mussulmans, with whom there had been a feud. It seems that at Zahleh the people made a defence, but were at last overpowered. The Druses gained possession of the town, and committed most horrible butcheries. But there also a considerable number of the Christian population were able to retire before the massacre began. It is quite true that the general state of that country is, as my noble Friend described it, one of the greatest confusion and disturbance. How the feud originated is at present a matter of doubt, for not only does it appear to have sprung from the hereditary hatred of the Druses against the Maronites, but the Druses are joined by other tribes, and to some extent by the Mussulman population generally. The Turkish authorities are much to be blamed for not having taken active measures. The Turkish troops in the neighbourhood of Zahleh not only took no steps to put down the disorder, and to resist the Druses, but they also failed to afford the Christians any facilities for escape. The only excuse for the Turkish authorities is that practically they are powerless. There is a great want of troops, and their authority is altogether disregarded by the mountaineers. Where even they have the will they have not the power to preserve order. The Ambassadors of the different Powers at Constantinople met together some weeks ago and agreed to send instructions to their consuls in Syria to communicate with the Turkish Pashas, and to endeavour to induce them to take some active measures. We have not received the information, but intelligence has reached France that Fuad Pasha has been sent with extensive powers to put down rebellion, that reinforcements of troops have also been sent, and that efforts will be made to restore order. The latest accounts from the English Consul at Damascus, state that great apathy is displayed by the Turkish authorities, and that apprehension is entertained of an outbreak in that city, but he thinks that apprehension is not altogether well founded. It is only right to say that there are other persons who take a different view; but it is the consul's opinion that if the Turkish authorities do their duty, Damascus will not undergo the same horrors which have occurred in other towns, and that it will be able to resist all attacks which may be made upon it. My noble Friend asks whether we can lay the papers on the subject on the table of the House. I have not had an opportunity of communicating with my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office, but I do not think it likely that there will be any objection to their production. With regard to the steps which have been taken by Her Majesty's Government, as soon as intelligence reached us, before the latest accounts, orders were sent to Admiral Martin to proceed with a squadron to the coast of Syria, to take such steps as might be necessary for the protection of British subjects, and the safety of the Christian population. We are informed that the French Government have sent some ships of war for the same purpose to that coast, and that there are also vessels there belonging to Russia and other Powers. Her Majesty's Government are in communication with the Governments of Turkey, Russia, Prussia, Austria, and France as to the further measures which will become necessary. With regard to any communication by M. Thouvenel to the Porte that the French Government will be compelled to take strong measures if the Porte is not able to repress these disorders, I can only say that we have not received any intimation of it from Paris, and that we are not aware of any such communication having been made. The whole of the Powers have an earnest desire that some steps should be taken to prevent the recurrence of these atrocities, and the deepest attention of Her Majesty's Government is fixed upon this important matter. One of the consuls reports that there are 20,000 women and children wandering over these mountains, without shelter, and with the chance of being murdered by the infuriated Druses. The lamentable condition of the Christian population demands the fullest consideration of the Government, and I also agree with the noble Lord that they are bound to give their most earnest attention to the political aspect of the affair, inasmuch as Syria is a quarter of the Turkish empire where the authority of the Porte is known to be exceedingly weak. The noble Lord having referred indirectly to other parts of the Turkish empire, I may mention that the result of the communications between the different Powers upon the proposals made by the Russian Government, has been that a Commission has been sent by the Porte to inquire into the condition of the northern provinces; and that all the Powers have agreed to wait to see what the result of that Commission will be, in the hope that these inquiries will be conducted with impartiality and with a desire to find out clearly what may be the real state of things in those provinces.

LORD BROUGHAM: My Lords, I am sorry to find from the statement of the noble Lord that my noble Friend who brought forward this question has been but too well informed, and that, to a great extent indeed, miserable scenes have taken place in Syria. It is most painful to humanity, and not free from difficulty—nay, it is full of difficulty, because, however much we may commiserate those unfortunate persons who have been sufferers from these outrages, unhappily it may all arise, not from the bad faith or obstinacy of the Turkish Government, but from its weakness and incapacity; and I gravely fear that that is the origin of these atrocities. I think my noble Friend will do well to bring this matter before your Lordships in a more formal manner after the papers have been produced which the noble Lord says there is no objection to lay on the table of the House.

LORD WODEHOUSE: I did not say that there was no objection, but that I thought there would be none.

LORD BROUGHAM: My noble Friend said, he had not had an opportunity of consulting the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office; but I think I may assume that there will be no difficulty in producing those papers. My noble Friend who introduced this subject referred to an observation which I made last night, and upon which he has entirely misunderstood me. Heaven forbid that I, of all men, should undervalue the law of nations, or in any respect whatever underrate the great importance of its principles and the absolute necessity of always maintaining those principles sacred. But I held it to be, and I still hold it to be, no part of the law of nations to interfere in other countries to prevent the people from doing justice to themselves, from righting themselves, and from vindicating themselves. On the contrary, I hold it to be the most sacred principle of the law of nations to prevent all interference by one Power, or any combination of Powers, with the internal affairs of any other Power. No doubt, there might be strong cases of exception to all rules; but it is needless to indicate what would form a case to justify a breach of the principle of non-interference, because I can hardly conceive any case which could justify it. With respect to the case of Sicily, which gave rise to my observations, I held, and I hold it still, to be no part of the law of nations to render the Sicilians incompetent to right themselves and to throw off any form of government which they dislike, or under which they may suffer, without our help. On the contrary, it is according to the law of nations that they should do so of themselves. And when it is said that General Garibaldi is a foreigner and not a Sicilian, I say he is as much a Sicilian as William III. was an Englishman, with this difference, that General Garibaldi has not married the Neapolitan King's daughter, and is not the Neapolitan King's nephew, as was the case of William III. in relation to James II.

Lord Brougham

TITHE COMMUTATION BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee on the Tithe Commutation Bill read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY suggested that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he had been requested to draw attention to the way in which it was alleged this Bill had been introduced and passed through the other House. It very greatly affected private interests, and especially the interests of St. John's College, Cambridge, and it would override a local Act of Parliament. He understood that the provisions of the Bill would expose the parties to ruin if they were agreed to, and it would inflict a great injustice upon others. He would suggest that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, and not passed in so great a hurry through the House.

EARL DE GREY and RIPON said, this Bill was a public Bill, and therefore the complaints as to want of notice were unfounded. The Bill had been passed through the other House in the same manner as all other public Bills, and therefore if the complaints were well-founded it was the business of the parties and their representatives in the other House to pay attention to the Bill. But it passed without opposition in the other House, and it was only reasonable to suppose there would be no serious opposition to it in this House. He did not understand that there was any wish to defeat the passing of the Bill by delay, and therefore he would not object to its being sent to a Select Committee.

Order discharged; and Bill referred to a Select Committee:

The Lords following were named of the Committee:—

M. Salisbury	L. Portman
E. Spencer	L. Cranworth
E. Carnarvon	L. Churston
E. De Grey	L. Egerton
L. Bp. Bath and Wells	L. Taunton
L. Wynford

RAILWAY CHEAP TRAINS, &c., BILL.

LORD WODEHOUSE moved the second reading of this Bill, the object of which was to make perpetual the 21 & 22 Vict., c. 75, to amend the Law relating to Cheap Trains, and to restrain the exercise of certain powers by Canal Companies, being also Railway Companies.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD wished to call the attention of the Government to the necessity of taking some steps to ensure an easy communication between the various lines of railway in his county. Now that the whole internal communication of the country was in the hands of these great railway companies, Parliament ought to exercise some supervision over the powers which had been granted, in order that they might see that the communication was made as complete as possible for passengers. At nearly all the great points of communication the different railway companies were in a state of hostility, the consequence of which was serious inconvenience to the public, and, he believed, serious injury to the railway companies. He had been assured by the railway directors that they would rejoice if Parliament would make some regulation upon this subject, as it was impossible for the directors themselves to deal with the evil, as any company which chose to refuse to enter into any arrangement would obtain an unfair advantage. The Board of Trade should have power to compel each company to make a continued communication at certain times under a heavy penalty. He hoped the noble Lord would bring the subject under the consideration of the Government.

LORD REDESDALE said, the suggestion of the right rev. Prelate could not be carried out in this Bill. This Bill was for the purpose of making certain Acts perpetual, and to add a clause of the sort suggested would not give the question fair consideration, which he thought ought to receive the attention of Parliament and the Government.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY was of the same opinion.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said that, instead of one, forty clauses and a very elaborate system would be required to provide for such a system as that proposed by the right rev. Prelate.

LORD CRANWORTH said, an attempt was made to legislate upon this matter some three or four years ago; and what was now required was that Parliament should pass an Act to tell railway companies how they should arrange their trains at points of intersection. But he thought that the Legislature could not interfere with the discretion of the directors, and that all had been done which Parliament could do.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Thursday next,
half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, July 10, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Votes at Elections; Railways (Ireland) Act (1851) Amendment; East India Stock Transfer, &c.; Maynooth College; Turnpike Acts Continuance; Copyhold and Inclosure Commissions, &c.; Turnpike Trusts Arrangements; Highway Rates Act Continuance; Weights and Measures (Ireland). 3^o Dominica Hurricane Loan; Admiralty Court Jurisdiction (No. 2.)

NUISANCES REMOVAL AND DISEASES PREVENTION BILL.—COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [14th June], "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration," read, and discharged.

Bill Re-committed.

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (How Expenses of Local Authority to be defrayed).

MR. PERRY WATLINGTON proposed that after the word "expenses," there should be inserted the words "as are of a common nature."

MR. AYRTON objected to the clause, as it gave power to a Board to levy rates for the suppression of nuisances on any parishes. The effect might be that great injustice would be done to particular parishes, and works carried out without the consent of their representatives.

MR. NORRIS said, he hoped the clause would be retained in its present form, otherwise parishes which derived no benefit from the improvements carried out might be obliged to pay for them.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, difficulties would arise as to the levying of the money necessary for such expenses as could not be taken out of the common fund. Expenses that were in common should be raised in common, but he thought the power given to the Boards to levy funds for works done in particular parishes would require serious consideration.

MR. HENLEY said, he regretted that the Government should have gone back again to the Board of Guardians to take management of these financial affairs, considering the dissatisfaction that was caused by their management formerly. The proper course was to make each parish do its own work, and to compel the parochial authorities to act if they refused to do so. The truth was that the Poor Law Board and the Board of Health had nothing to do, and the consequence was that they were always ready to interfere in matters that did not require their interference. He thought the best thing the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) could do would be to withdraw the Bill altogether.

MR. LOWE said, the necessity of introducing a Bill of the kind had arisen from the fact that the House had thought proper to destroy the central body which had formerly existed, and to transfer its powers to the local authorities. But the new system, it was found, did not work, as the local authorities were unwilling or unable to enforce the unwelcome authority which had been committed to their hands for the removal of nuisances. There were 14,400 places in which there ought to have been local authorities to carry out the Act; but out of these there were 12,500 places in which no inspectors had been appointed—that was to say, in which there was no authority at all to carry the Act into operation. It was necessary, therefore, to find some means of carrying out the Act. The right hon. Gentleman said the existing local authorities should be compelled to act; but this was utterly impracticable, as there was no way by which a man complaining of a nuisance was able to reach them, the local authorities not being corporate bodies. The proposal in the Bill was that the duty should be discharged by the Boards of Guardians, a body that could easily be communicated with, and easily set in Motion. As to the question of payment, the proposal was that each parish should pay the expenses of removing nuisances within itself; but that the expense of an inspector of nuisances, common to an entire union, should be paid out of the common fund of the union. The expenses of such inspectors must be exceedingly small, and that alone would fall upon the common fund. All the main expenses would be paid by each particular parish for itself.

Mr. Sotheron Estcourt

MR. ADDERLEY said, he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that there was a necessity for this Bill. Practically, there was no sanitary authority in the small parishes; and there were only two ways of remedying the evil; one to compel the local authorities to act, and the other to transfer the powers to Boards of Guardians, as now proposed, and this last course he entirely preferred, especially as the Boards of Guardians would now act on their own authority, and not be the instruments of a central board. However, he did not see the necessity for a permanent salaried sanitary inspector.

MR. PERRY WATLINGTON withdrew his Amendment, and proposed in the same clause to omit the words, "common fund," and to add the words, "by means of an addition to be made to the rate for the relief of the poor of the parish in which the nuisance has arisen, and to be raised and paid in like manner as the money raised for the relief of the poor."

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT expressed his opinion that inspectors should not be permanently appointed, and that Boards should have a discretionary power in their appointment.

MR. LOWE intimated that he would comply with the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. HENLEY said, it now appeared that the Boards of Guardians were not to be compelled to appoint inspectors; but it might be found that the Boards were not quite so pliable as seemed to be anticipated, and in that case there would be no local authority to provide for putting down nuisances. It would be better to name in the Bill a particular official who should be bound to carry the Act into operation.

MR. AYRTON said, to give to the Board of Guardians absolute control over the parishes, to make the parishes pay all the expenses, and to give no appeal against the decision of the Board of Guardians—no remedy, no power of revision whatever—was a proceeding which was never before proposed to the House of Commons. If any one disputed the jurisdiction, the officer was directed by the Act to take proceedings in the higher courts, and thus a parish would be involved in a most expensive kind of lawsuit, and would have to pay all the expense, although it might have had no part whatever in the proceeding, and might even have protested against it.

Amendment agreed to. Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill, as were also the remaining Clauses. Two additional Clauses were added.

MR. FREELAND moved the following Clause:—

“No justice of the peace shall, unless objected to at the hearing of any complaint or charge, be deemed incapable of acting in cases arising under the said Nuisances Removal Act by reason of his being a member of any body hereby declared to be the local authority to execute the said Act, or by reason of his being a contributor, or liable to contribute, to any rate or fund out of which it is hereby provided that all charges and expenses incurred in executing the said Act, and not recovered as therein provided, shall be defrayed.”

Clause agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

SAVINGS BANKS AND FRIENDLY SOCIETIES INVESTMENT BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Stock to be Cancelled).

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: Having held the position of Manager and Trustee of the Bath Savings Bank for a period extending to nigh thirty years, I may be permitted to express my opinion, which is shared in by that Board, that this Bill is unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it leaves the administration of Savings Bank Funds nominally in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, but really in those of the Minister of Finance, who, although managing them as I unquestionably admit with great ability and integrity, is frequently beset with motives and necessities at variance, as it occurs to me, with what I consider a duty to the Savings Bank. The interests involved in these institutions are of such vast importance as to call for the appointment of a special Commission, who would watch over the funds as a public trust, see to their safe and profitable investment, and take steps to supervise and extend the system and utility of Savings Banks throughout the country. And it appears to me that the 15th clause of this Bill, if passed, would at once render necessary an alteration in the existing rules and regulations throughout the country, whereas an intelligible Consolidation Act is expressly desirable which will embody all provisions for regulating the management of Savings Banks and the right of depositors.

MR. AYRTON wished to remind the House of the recommendation made by the Committee that had been appointed to consider this subject. They recommended that a Commission, having some elements independent of the Chancellor of the Exchequer (though he was to be a Member of it), should be appointed to undertake the management of the aggregate funds of Savings Banks, the object being to keep the funds of Savings Banks and Friendly Societies separate and distinct from the other funds under the administration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Committee wished the Commission to be Trustees for the Savings Banks, having funds either in Consols or Exchequer bills, equal to the charges that would be made upon them. The proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, was that he should be a great State banker for the Savings Banks, with the power of administering the funds for the benefit of the depositors, but a banker in the novel position of having no securities to cover the charges against him. The question which they had to decide was, whether the recommendation of the Select Committee as to the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to be adopted, and he hoped that issue would be fairly taken up by the Committee. He contended that, while the public sustained heavy loss, the result would be that in future they would be compelled to lower the rate of interest paid to the depositors of the Savings Banks.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the Committee would proceed to the consideration of the clause before it instead of discussing the points raised by the hon. Gentleman in his very discursive speech. One of the questions raised by the hon. Gentleman—namely, the recommendation of the Select Committee, had been already decided by the House, when it was raised a few evenings ago by the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham; and the other when the hon. Baronet moved the postponement of the first three clauses. He denied that he was making himself a banker for the Savings Banks. The truth was, that the State had already constituted itself a banker in that respect, and the arrangement was none of his. The hon. Gentleman complained that the public were fleeced now, and that the depositors would be fleeced hereafter by a lowering of the rate of interest. He would only say, passing by his reference to the present, that he totally disbelieved his prophecy as to the future. He knew no reason why the rate of interest paid to depositors in the Savings Banks should be altered, unless Parliament should choose to do so as a matter of policy. It would be a most unjust proceeding to lower the rate of interest in consequence of any real or supposed mismanagement of the funds. By the clause they were now discussing, it was proposed to cancel a large quantity of stock, and in the clause that followed they proposed to substitute for it a credit on the State deposit account. It was not intended to inscribe on the State deposit account the whole of the funds, but as much as they could fairly venture to do, retaining a certain amount to meet the demands of the savings-banks' depositors. Other arrangements for carrying out this object were provided for, and he hoped the clause would meet with the assent of the Committee.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Tuesday next, at Twelve of the clock.

THE PUNISHMENT OF WHIPPING. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will consider the propriety of recommending the exercise of the prerogative of mercy in the case of a prisoner in Hertford Gaol named Williams, convicted at the last Court of Quarter Sessions at Hertford of simple larceny, and sentenced to imprisonment and whipping, so far as the remission of the corporal punishment is concerned?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, in answer to the question of the noble Lord, he would read a statement which had been furnished to him by the Marquess of Salisbury, Chairman of the Quarter Sessions, at which the prisoner in question was tried:—

"The case of the convict Williams is as follows. He is a common tramp, without any home. He came out of an Essex gaol—I believe Chelmsford—into Hertfordshire, immediately committed some robbery, of which he was summarily convicted, and for which he was imprisoned, I think, for six weeks. At the expiration of his sentence he was dismissed from gaol with the usual allowance, and, his boots being in a bad state, they were repaired. He went to a lodginghouse at Ware (two miles only from Hertford), and the same evening at dusk he rang the bell at a shoemaker's shop, and, having ascertained by this means that no one was in the shop he went in and stole a pair of boots. The shopkeeper went to the door, but, finding nobody, thought the bell had been rung out of mischief. The next day Williams was detected in some other robbery by a policeman. He was taken to the gaol at Hertford. The warder who examined him on his entrance observed that the boots he had on were new, and not the same as those with which he had been dismissed from the gaol. From the shuffling answer he gave an inquiry was made, and the owner was found. The boots were identified by the shopman as having been in the shop on the preceding evening. Some other corroborative evidence was adduced at the trial before me at Easter Quarter Sessions, with which I need not trouble you, and Williams was found 'Guilty.' There was a second indictment for the robbery which led to his apprehension. Both were handed up to me as true bills. I cannot say why I selected the robbery detailed for trial. I took no note of the other, but can of course procure it, as well as an accurate statement of the prisoner's history previously to the robbery for which he was tried before me. I sentenced him to three months' imprisonment and a private whipping. I submit that if ever there was a case in which whipping was a desirable punishment it was the present. The man evidently lived upon plunder. A gaol was no punishment to him, and I could not have sentenced him to the severe penalty of penal servitude without trying him for the second robbery."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

To show the House that the sentence was perfectly legal, the third section of the 7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 29 (Sir Robert Peel's Consolidating Act for larceny), gave the Court of Quarter Sessions full power to inflict that sentence. It was a perfectly legal sentence, and it appeared to him that if whipping was to be ever inflicted by sentence of Quarter Sessions on an indictment which gave the opportunity of defence by counsel, and with all the solemnities of justice, the present was a most proper case in which it should take place.

KENSINGTON GARDENS. QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether a portion of Kensington Gardens, which has recently been fenced off with iron hurdles in the shape and size of a "two-year-old course," is intended for the purpose of forming a road from Tyburnia to Belgravia; or whether the object is to afford accommodation to the equestrian portion of the population, to the exclusion of the pedestrian, in the most agreeable and most frequented part of Kensington Gardens?

MR. COWPER said, when the public were admitted freely to Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens it was the wish of Her Majesty and her predecessors that that Park and those gardens should subserve the greatest amount of recreation and enjoyment of all classes, rich and poor, those using horses, and those who go on foot. Recently the accommodations had been greatly extended. Flowers had been planted along the sidewalks, seats had been provided for the public, and walks formed in all directions. But it appeared to him that there was one class whose comfort had been greatly overlooked; he meant those were in the habit of riding in Rotten Row. That class consisted of lawyers, doctors, and other professional men, who were obliged to take their exercise in a very short space of time. They had hitherto been confined to a narrow and dusty piece of ground, where they had to go backwards and forwards without the power of diverging to the right or the left, and he had thought that, without interfering with the proper recreation of pedestrians, a larger space might advantageously be appropriated to the use of those who rode. He had therefore arranged that there should be an entrance for horses at the west end of Rotten Row, between the two gates devoted to foot passengers. He did not believe that those who had heretofore walked there would have any ground of complaint if an avenue were set apart for riders; for Rotten Row was a narrow strip of only a mile and a quarter, while pedestrians had appropriated to them upwards of 600 acres in Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens. Moreover, the fences were so arranged that persons on foot would not be absolutely excluded from the place devoted to horse exercise. A passage would be opened for riders on the north and south, which would be a great convenience to many. These alterations had given great satisfaction not only to the persons who visited this road on horseback, but to many pedestrians, who thought the solitude of Kensington Gardens would be much enlivened by the presence of riders of both sexes.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any arrangement has been agreed upon between the Governments of Great Britain and France on the subject of the Newfoundland Fisheries, and when the Report of the Commissioners will be laid upon the Table?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, an arrangement had been come to between the Governments of England and France relating to these fisheries. The subject had engaged the attention of his noble Friend, the Secretary of State for the Colonies; but he would endeavour to ascertain for the hon. Gentleman how soon the Report of the Commissioners, and other papers connected with this question, could be produced.

ITALY.—SARDINIA AND NAPLES.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has reason to believe that great pressure is being put upon the Government of Sardinia by that of France, to induce the former to enter into alliance with the Government of Naples, on the strength of the promise of a Constitution; and whether the British Government will afford its moral support to the Government of Sardinia, to enable it to preserve its independence and liberty of action, in respect to any such proposed alliance?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I received a communication the other day from Sir James Hudson, which enables me to say that no pressure has been put upon the Government of Sardinia by the Government of France, to induce the former to enter into an alliance with the King of Naples.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would also beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, by his acceptance of the proposed Conference upon the question of the Annexation of Savoy, in his Despatch of the 25th day of June, it is distinctly understood by the French Government, that the question of an efficient substitute for the neutralization of Savoy, by the cession of such "a military frontier to Switzerland as should comprise the southern shores of the Lake of Geneva and the Alpine passes of the Valais," as stated to be, in his opinion, necessary in his Despatch of the 15th day of May to Lord Cowley, is to be fully and freely submitted to the consideration of the proposed Conference, and is not to be presumed to be precluded by any declarations that may hitherto have been made by the French Government in any quarter on that subject?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, the subject for the Conference would be to put the 92nd Article of the Treaty of Vienna in accord with the 2nd Article of the Treaty of Turin. It would be competent for Her Majesty's Government, or any other Power represented at the Conference, to state in what manner they thought that object ought to be effected. Of course, it would also be competent for the French Government to make any objection it deemed fit to any such proposal.

THE WHITWORTH GUN.—QUESTION.

MR. DODSON said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any foundation for the report that the Government have purchased the patent of Whitworth's Gun?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the statement was not true that the Government had purchased the patent of Whitworth's Gun, though they had purchased many guns fabricated according to that patent.

NAVY (CHINA).

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he rose, agreeably to notice, to submit to the House the grounds on which he claimed for the marines and the officers and men of the navy employed in China the same pay and allowances as were given to Her Majesty's troops. He would not now touch upon the larger question of the Chinese war, which was to be debated on Thursday or Friday, but would simply point out that from the first commencement of our unfortunate wars with China the army and navy had fought side by side, and had shared the same dangers and privations, but not the same hopes and rewards. It was most important, at the beginning of the present war, that there should not exist, during its prosecution, a feeling on the part of a sister service that injustice was done them. In all our operations in China, in the capture of Chusan in 1841, and in the subsequent attacks upon Canton, Shanghai, and Ningpo in the same year, during the last war (which was commonly called the lorcha war), and in the recent disastrous affair at the mouth of the Peiho river, the seamen and marines had shared all the dangers and difficulties of the troops, and had contributed as much as they had done to the success of our arms. Both Lord Gough and the gallant Admiral opposite (Sir Michael Seymour) had borne testimony to that fact; and the latter gallant Officer had urged upon the Admiralty the necessity of placing seamen in China upon the same footing as regarded pay as Her Majesty's troops. How had they been treated? And for that treatment he did not blame the Government or the Admiralty, but the system, especially that portion of it in accordance with which the Board of Admiralty was so frequently changed. The seamen and marines who played a principal part in the capture of Canton during the late war received only their pay, while the troops received a consolidated allowance in amount nearly double their regular pay. In the year 1842 the officers of Her Majesty's forces who went to China received an allowance of £100 each, but the officers of the Royal Marines got only £5 each. A precedent had already been established for giving extra pay to sailors, because those who were engaged in the Burmese war received six months' batta. He believed the best way to prevent dissatisfaction in the fleet and to insure the good conduct of the men was to prove to them that they were treated according to the principles of justice and humanity. We were beginning a war in China which would demand the most perfect union and concord on the part of the services, and under these circumstances he would implore the Government not to negative his proposition.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to place the Officers, Marines, and Seamen of the Fleet serving in China on the same footing as Her Majesty's Troops, with respect to extra pay and allowances; and to assure Her Majesty that this House will make good the same."

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR said, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion. He did so on the ground set forth in the despatch to the Board of Admiralty to which the hon. Member had alluded. He admitted that the navy had no legal right to make the demand involved in the Motion, but, nevertheless, he trusted the House would give it their favourable consideration, as it was based upon justice. It was always important that the seamen belonging to the fleet should have no reason for feeling that they were not sufficiently cared for or rewarded. He might add that at the close of the different wars with China, and of the Burmese war, additional pay in the shape of gratuities had been given to the seamen and marines who had served, but when at the close of the operations conducted in China under his command, he applied to the Admiralty for a similar grant, they refused to accede to his request. Even under ordinary circumstances and in time of peace, when sailors were employed away from their ships in operations in which there was likely to be any great wear and tear of their clothes, they received a compensation; and in this instance they had been engaged in garrisoning forts on the Canton river, and in conveying merchants from Canton to Hong Kong, the river being unsafe on account of the number of war junks that were upon it. During the recent operations in China he was reluctantly obliged to comply with the request of some of his best men to be discharged upon the completion of their term of service. They wished, they said, to better their condition elsewhere, and, although they were excellent seamen, he was constrained to dispense with their services. If gratuities or extra pay could not be given to the men, he would recommend that good service should be taken into consideration when calculating the term for a pension.

Mr. Darby Griffith

ADMIRAL WALCOTT cordially gave his assent to this Motion. He could not understand why the reward given to soldiers should not be extended to seamen who experienced the same vicissitudes of life, were subject to the same wear and tear of the constitution, and exposed to the same privations and dangers. This distinction between the two services was calculated to engender a heartburning prejudicial to that cordiality which was essential for the proper conduct of the services, and for the success and glory of their arms. Nevertheless the fact that it had not hitherto abated by one jot the gallantry of the seamen and marines, must impress on the Government the propriety of awarding to them the same justice as was awarded to the army. He could not comprehend how a naval officer could sit at the Board of Admiralty and neglect to perform, in this respect, the duty he owed the profession to which he had the honour to belong.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he felt indebted for the manner in which the present Motion had been introduced to the House, and for the interest which the hon. Gentleman had evinced for a service to which he did not himself belong. The hon. Gentleman, in alluding in terms of warm praise to the services of the navy during the late operations in China, and during former wars in that quarter, had not quite done justice to the Governments of the time for their treatment of the officers and men. During all the former wars in China and during the late war in India they had had extra allowances granted to them in the shape of "donation batta." It was impossible that they could have allowances granted to them except at the end of any great operation. Firstly, he should have little difficulty in showing that to pay the officers of the navy as the hon. Gentleman proposed by his Resolution would be impossible, for the extra pay and allowances received by the army for services in India and China were, in fact, field allowances—field batta money—for services away from their proper quarters. Now, no person ever pretended that the navy would have any right to claim field allowances, though they might be granted recompenses for their services, particularly when they were joined with the army in operations. But to give them field allowances would be out of the question, because they did not live in the field. Even if they were serving on shore, and were wounded, or fell into any misfortune, they had a ship to be brought back to; in fact, they had a home, which soldiers had not. No doubt they encountered equal danger with the soldier, but they could not be said to experience the same privations. So much as regards the officers; and, with respect to the men, the additional allowances which the army got were in the shape of suspensions of stoppages. The men in the army had a certain amount of pay, and certain stoppages were made from their pay for their provisions. When they served in India or China those stoppages were lessened to a certain extent, so that, in fact, they received greater pay. Now, in the navy there were no stoppages of pay, for all the sailors received their provisions without any stoppages. Therefore, on that ground sailors could not be put on the same footing as the army, and it was impracticable to carry out the wishes expressed in the Motion, because the system of the navy was totally distinct from that of the army. In reference to the Motion two questions had to be dealt with—the past and the present. It was quite certain that if the present naval expedition to China were at a future time to receive a donation it would be necessary to consider the claims of those who took part in the last operations in China; and here he would observe that no services were more appreciated at the Admiralty than those of the gallant Admiral who had seconded the Motion (Sir Michael Seymour); they could not overlook the gallant conduct of those who were engaged under his command in the last war. The Government felt that the House of Commons would always be disposed to deal generously by the navy, and to pay regard to the services the officers and men performed during the latter operations in China, commencing with what was called the Lorcha War, and terminating with the treaty of Tien-tsin. For the purpose of rewarding the officers, seamen, and marines of the fleet engaged in the operations under his gallant Friend, the Government were preparing an Estimate framed in the same spirit as former Estimates for similar services. And with regard to those now engaged in China, he was positive, without saying anything about the amount or mode of distribution, that he might give a pledge, on the part of the present or any future Government, that at the conclusion of the operations a fair reward should be proposed for the gallant officers, seamen, and marines engaged in them. It was right he should inform the House that the Admiralty were now on the eve of distributing what was called the Canton prize money, in which both the army and navy would participate; and it was only in consequence of difficulties with other departments that the money had not already been distributed. In submitting the Estimate which he would shortly lay before the House he should enter into detail as to the principle on which they asked for this sum of money, and as to the amount of donation which they proposed to give to the officers and men of the navy. Further than this he could not go at that time, except to assure the House that the gallant services of the navy in China were duly appreciated. Under the circumstances, his hon. Friend would probably not press his Motion to a division.

COLONEL NORTH said, he was happy to feel that there existed between the officers and men of the two services the most brotherly feeling, and anything that might tend to the advantage of the navy would always be received with enthusiasm by the army. It appeared that many seamen and marines in China had been employed in garrisoning forts ashore, and, at all events, when they landed in this way they ought to receive the same pay and allowances as the soldiers. As an army officer he had risen to express a hope that the claim of the other service would be considered, and he might add that it would be more satisfaction to them to receive what they considered was their right than to receive afterwards what that House might consider them entitled to.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he could not allow that batta money donations were at all to be compared with field allowances. Batta money was originally a grant of money made by the East India Company to officers and men serving in their army. Considering that this was the origin of the grant, it was still more unjust that officers of the army should get a grant of batta money, but that seamen and marines on board ship should receive none. They wondered and complained that men were not to be found to enter the navy; but how was it to be wondered at, when it appeared that the men were paid differently from those serving in the army? It appeared that the Admiralty were going to reconsider the question of compensation two years after the services which it was to reward. Now, compensation deferred for two years was no compensation at all. Sailors liked to receive at once what they earned. The Admiralty were always "going to do" something. They delayed in everything. Why half the sailors engaged in the Canton operations were dispersed over the world—many were dead, and not one-third of them would ever get the grant; and those who did get it would have forgotten what it was for. The Admiralty had better mend their manners and treat the men properly. There ought to be no difference between the soldier and the sailor. He did not believe that this matter would ever have been taken up if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cochrane) had not brought it forward. What had the Admiralty done for his (Sir Charles Napier's) gallant relative, Admiral Hope, on account of his brilliant though unsuccessful operations? Nothing whatever. Nor had they done anything for the sailors under him. The services performed by them were of the most gallant description. Even when they were unsuccessful, and they were recalled to their ships, what did they do? Instead of at once returning to their ships, they in the face of enormous difficulties exclaimed, "Let us try another chance." But as yet, the men had received no recompense whatever, and he had been told of an unfortunate fellow who had lost an arm there, who had a pension of £16, limited to one year only. That was a new plan, which he had never heard of before. He hoped the statement was untrue, but he had it on excellent authority. In the face of such facts as these, no one need wonder that men did not enter the navy. They were not sufficiently well treated; and, as an additional instance of this, he hoped shortly to bring before the House the nefarious manner in which the funds of Greenwich Hospital had for the last seventy or eighty years been diverted from their proper channels. He hoped that his noble Friend would stir the Admiralty up to bring about a change in this state of things, and also to put both arms of the service on an equal footing.

Lord Clarence Paget

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thought that as we had now been in a normal state of war with China for twenty years, with very little present prospect of a change, it was high time that the Admiralty should be prepared with a plan for putting the sailors employed in this war on a proper footing as to their pay and allowances. From the nature of the country the navy must always play a considerable part in our wars with China. The men were obliged to be away from their ships in the boats for a long time, and anybody who had seen, as he had, the discomforts and hardships which they had to undergo would agree that it was absolutely necessary they should have batta issued to them in the same way as the army. They had to perform very heavy work in the day time with a burning sun over their heads, and at night with the thermometer down to 35° or 40°. In the day they were burnt up or eaten by mosquitoes, and at night they were nearly frozen to death. It must be remembered too, that the seaman was a skilled artificer, ready to put his hand to anything. If the Admiralty would produce some practical plan for doing the navy justice in this respect, it would be more creditable to them, and more profitable to the country, than squabbling about cutting down the half-pay of their officers.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he did not wish to give any opinion upon the question brought forward because it was not in his department. But it should be recollected that the question was one which required very great care to decide upon, inasmuch, as the troops did not, as a matter of course and in all places, obtain the Indian allowances when in China. For instance, at one time they had a garrison of British troops in Canton, together with Native troops; and the Europeans, being brigaded together with the Indian soldiers, received the Indian allowances. But a few miles off, at Hong Kong, there being no Native troops there, the British troops only received Hong Kong or Colonial pay, which was less than the Indian allowances. The gallant Admiral (Sir Charles Napier) spoke of the impropriety of allowing sailors to reflect that they were not receiving as much pay as soldiers in the army. [SIR CHARLES NAPIER: Additional pay.] The word "additional" was very important. The ordinary pay which the army received was not very much more than half that given to the navy.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER: Clothing?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, sailors got clothing at first.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER: For the last six months.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, a very large deduction was made from the soldier for his food, whereas he believed the rations were free rations on board ship.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE observed that the illustrations of the right hon. Gentleman did not much affect the question—Hong Kong being, as it were, an English colony. With the hope, however, that a full and ample amount of recompense would be granted, he was willing to withdraw the Motion, reserving to himself the right of renewing the question before the close of the Session, unless upon the Estimates an ample amount for the past, and a guarantee for the future, were given.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

VOTES AT ELECTIONS BILL—LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. WYLD, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill relating to the mode of taking votes at elections, said, it would be a mistake to confound his Bill with the Ballot. The system which he wished to introduce might be either open or secret. Hon. Gentlemen of all parties concurred in the desire to remove the stain of corruption from our electoral system, and all the evidence before the Select Committee which had sat lately showed that it was necessary that some alteration should be made in the mode of taking votes. He proposed that when a man presented himself at the polling-booth to vote his name and residence should be asked, and that, having satisfied the returning officer of his identity, a paper should be handed to him having his number on the register printed outside, and the names of the candidates printed inside. He should then go into an adjoining room, and strike out the name of the candidate for whom he did not vote. This might be done either secretly or openly. [An ineffectual attempt was made to count out the House.] His object was not so much to give an explanation of the Bill as to lay it on the table in order that it might be considered, and, perhaps, at some future time incorporated in a great Government measure. The system which he proposed was somewhat similar to the Australian ballot system. It might be said that they ought not to receive suggestions from Australia, but he took the liberty of saying that any suggestion was worthy of attention, no matter from what part of the world it came, provided it came from those who had tried our legislative system. He begged to move for leave to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the law and practice in taking votes at elections.

Mr. HADFIELD seconded the Motion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he understood that the Bill had mainly for its object the introduction of a system of voting papers as practised in our Colonies. That system was, in fact, engrafted on the Bill which was proposed by Her Majesty's late Government, and which was under the consideration of the House last Session. As that was the case, there was no objection to the repetition of the proposition in the Bill of the hon. Member.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it must not be supposed that, in consenting to the introduction of the Bill, the Government would support it. It might well be imagined that under the misty covering in which the hon. Gentleman enveloped his proposal, a nucleus of the Ballot was contained within it.

Mr. HADFIELD said, the noble Lord need be under no apprehension that he would be prejudiced by assenting to the introduction of this measure.

Leave given.

"Bill to alter and amend the Law and practice relating to the taking of Votes at Elections for Members to serve in Parliament."

Mr. Wyld

Ordered to be brought in by Mr. WYLD and Mr. CHILDERS."

Bill presented, and read 1°; to be read 2° on 24th July, and to be printed [Bill 248].

GAS (METROPOLIS) BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

MR. STANILAND said, when he told the House that this Bill directly affected property to the value of £6,000,000 or £7,000,000, and prospectively affected an amount of property equal to half the amount of the national debt, he had said enough to insure the patient attention of hon. Members to the measure before the House. It would be necessary to detain the House somewhat at length in order to put them in possession of the facts of the case; but inasmuch as he sought the reversal of a decision of a Committee, which at all times was a most difficult task to accomplish, especially when that Committee sat twenty-one days, and was presided over by a Gentleman so universally and deservedly respected as the right hon. Member for Wiltshire (Mr. Sotherton Estcourt), the House would see that he had undertaken no ordinary duty. It had always been the policy of the Legislature to encourage the investment of capital in national undertakings, securing on the one hand a fair remuneration for the capital invested, and on the other imposing such restrictions on companies as would protect the public interests. That was the principle which actuated their railway legislation in 1844. An Act then passed for encouraging the investment of capital in that description of property, which provided that if at any time after the end of twenty-one years from that period, it should be shown that railways on an average for the last three years had earned and divided 10 per cent, it would be competent to Government to cut down the rates, but, if they did, they should secure the maximum rate of dividend. In 1847, previous to which there had been extensive operations throughout the kingdom in gas and water, the Government introduced two measures—one applicable to gas, the other to water. The provisions of both were identical, making it competent to gas and water companies to earn and pay a dividend of 10 per cent, and if, after 10 per cent paid, and laying apart a sum equal to one-tenth of their capital to meet depreciation of their property, they still showed a surplus profit, the public might come in and participate by a reduction of charge. Various Acts of Parliament had since passed applicable to particular towns and companies, and in these the Gas and Water Companies Acts had been incorporated. A very large amount had been expended in these undertakings—in gas companies no less than £18,000,000 had been invested in the United Kingdom, one-third of which belonged to the various Metropolitan gas companies. They had also a debenture debt of £1,000,000. £12,000,000 had been invested in gas companies in the provinces. In London water companies £6,000,000 had been invested, and in the provinces double that amount, so that, in these two cases of gas and water companies, a capital of not less than £36,000,000 had been invested on the faith of Acts of Parliament, under which proprietors were permitted, if the profits enabled them, to receive a dividend not exceeding 10 per cent. That was the state of things at the present moment as regarded capital invested. When any of the old companies came to Parliament during the last three or four years for an extension of their capital, Parliament said to them they must submit in respect to their further capital to a smaller maximum dividend, but in no one case had Parliament interfered to cut down this maximum 10 per cent on the old capital. So recently as 1854 the Imperial Gas Company, with a capital of £1,250,000, came to Parliament for powers to borrow £600,000 new capital, and, finding their management good, and no complaint made of their charges, Parliament applied the same rate of dividend to the new as to the old capital. So recently as last Session another London company, the City Gas Company, came again to that House for further capital and increased powers; and, although Parliament did limit the price of gas to 5s. per 1,000 feet instead of 6s., they still continued the maximum dividend of 10 per cent. The companies had invested their capital, relying upon the guarantee of the Legislature, but now that guarantee was to be repudiated, and the capitalists who formed those companies were told that in future their dividend must be at a lower rate. Those companies which were well managed of course had large dividends, and their shares had been regarded as favourable investments even by trustees. He found that in one company alone, the Imperial, there were no less than 252 ladies shareholders, whose capital produced them an income of £13,900 a year. Those ladies had, no doubt, been recommended to purchase gas shares, because they were an advantageous investment, and were carried on under a settled arrangement with the Legislature. In 1857 there was a change of circumstances. In the Metropolis some persons had formed themselves into gas companies, with no charter of incorporation, and without the sanction of an Act; and carried on their operations by permission of the vestries and local authorities. Those companies were not confined to any particular district, but extended their pipes in any district where they could get permission to open the roads; while the incorporated companies were limited to particular districts by the terms of the Acts constituting them. It was, however, found in 1857 that the extension of their pipes by the unincorporated companies had not diminished the price of gas to the consumer, although it had reduced the dividends of the shareholders. All the Metropolitan companies therefore agreed, in order to remove the grievance of continual stoppages in the streets arising from the laying down and repairs of pipes, and also for the sake of economy, that in future each company should take a particular district as arranged among themselves. Immediately that arrangement was made there came an outcry from the vestries of London—not from the consumers—against what they called monopoly. He understood monopoly to mean the exclusive right to deal in an article, and in consequence of that exclusive right furnishing a bad article at a price above its value. If that were a correct definition of monopoly, then he contended that the Metropolitan gas companies were not open to any such imputation, because, in assigning districts to each company, they did not attempt to exclude any capitalists who might choose to start fresh companies from entering those districts. The cry of monopoly was a dishonest, unfounded, and purely vestry cry. What had been the results of the arrangement he had described? It would naturally be supposed from the continual outcry of monopoly against the gas companies that the latter had raised their charges to the maximum price permitted to them by Parliament—6s. per £1,000 feet; but the fact was that since that arrangement not a single company had increased its rates. [Sir JOHN SHELLEY: Public lights?] He could enlighten the Committee on the matter to which the hon. Member referred. Public lights consumed an enormous amount of gas, which was charged for at a very low rate, quite disproportionate to its value. He could state that the companies lost money by every public lamp they lighted. But out of 13 Metropolitan companies only two had advanced their charges for the public lights, and the whole additional charge throughout the Metropolis did not exceed £300 a year. When he added that the Bill now before the Committee would give those companies power to charge a still higher rate, he thought he had succeeded in disposing of the cry of monopoly, which was a dishonest cry, got up by interested parties in order to deprive property of its rights.

In the last Session of Parliament a petition had been presented by various gas consumers of London. A Committee was appointed to investigate the charges set forth in the petition. The charges were, that the companies supplied bad gas of insufficient illuminating power; that they charged more than was necessary to produce for them the maximum dividend they were allowed to earn; that the streets were continually disturbed; that the companies were capricious in their mode of cutting off supplies, and that they were in the habit of requiring an incoming tenant to pay the arrears of his predecessor. Not one of those memorialists, however, had the courage, or he might say the audacity to ask the House to interfere with the rate of dividend permitted by the existing Acts of those companies. The Committee arrived at no conclusion, and consequently the same parties came this year to Parliament with the Bill under the consideration of the Committee. On the face of the Bill there was no attempt openly to interfere with the maximum rate of dividend fixed by previous Acts of Parliament, but it sought to do so indirectly by reducing the uniform price of 4s. 6d. per thousand feet of gas to 4s. The Committee to whom the Bill was referred, and which bestowed an unusual amount of pains on the subject, was presided over by the right hon. Member for Wiltshire (Mr. Estcourt) than whom nobody was more desirous to deal fairly between man and man, and after an inquiry of twenty-one days the measure assumed its present objectionable shape. It ought to be mentioned that the promoters previously circulated, in innumerable shop windows throughout London, a document which might be characterized as a wholesale solicitation to gas consumers to prefer accusations of every sort and kind against the Metropolitan companies. Of the grievances and complaints thus collected a liberal use was doubtless made before the Committee; yet on the 10th day of the investigation the Chairman said the Committee could have nothing to do with the crimination of the gas companies, having no grounds to suppose they had gone beyond the terms of their Acts. On the 13th day, when the counsel for the promoters had concluded their case, the Chairman intimated that the Committee had pretty well made up their minds upon certain points. Among those points was the substitution of inspectors for the existing tribunal for receiving complaints. The Committee also agreed that it was indispensably necessary to affirm distinctly by a clause of the Bill that which was to be the basis of all future operations namely,—not monopoly, but the “districting.” The Chairman also admitted that 10 per cent should be the maximum standard of profit, observing that the Committee only wished that the guarantee which Parliament had given to the capitalist as to the rate of dividend should be continued to him. On the faith of this intimation of the views of the Committee the counsel for the Opposition to the Bill subsequently assented to the preamble. Four days later, however, on going through the clauses, the Committee announced that they had seen reason to “resile” (to quote their own expression) upon the heads which they had laid down for the provisions of the Bill; in other words, that they wished to depart from almost every point which they had before indicated as essential to the measure. For the dividend of 10 per cent they substituted one of 8 per cent. They also wished when the 8 per cent was earned to reduce the price from 4s. 6d. to 4s., the effect of which would be to diminish the dividends of the whole of the London companies by 4 cent at a single blow. They further proposed to give the inspectors such unheard-of and inquisitorial powers as no company could possibly submit to. On the 19th day of the investigation the opponents of the Bill withdrew from the Committee, adopting that course, as was stated by Mr. Serjeant Wrangham, because certain propositions which had emanated from the Committee, and in consequence of which they had not opposed the preamble, had been departed from in such a direction and to such an extent that they were led to fear that the magnitude of the interests at stake was not duly appreciated by the Committee, or at all events, that the inevitable results of legislating upon such principles were not foreseen by them. From that time the Committee were left in the hands of the promoters of the Bill, and the consideration of the clauses was proceeded with. How those clauses were settled was well illustrated by what took place in regard to the reduction of the maximum dividend of 10 per cent, which Parliament had repeatedly guaranteed,—to 8 per cent. The Chairman first referred to the amount fixed in the Gas Works Clauses Act of 1847, and after some conversation with the Parliamentary agent and others said, "In the Gasworks Clauses Act it is 10 per cent: how would it do to put it at 8 per cent?" How would it do! This question was put to an agent who appeared there ex parte. Could hon. Members doubt what was his reply? He answered, "That would work more commercially." And thus in this most unsatisfactory manner, without data or calculations, was the maximum rate of dividend of 10 per cent reduced to 8 per cent. In making that alteration the Committee had done away with the distinction between old and new capital which had previously existed, and applied the same limit to companies which were now earning only 2 or 3 per cent, and to those which were making more than 8. The latter error was perceived by Mr. Denison, the counsel for the promoters, who pointed out that a different scale ought to be provided for companies which now paid more than 8 per cent, such as the Metropolitan, which paid 9, and the Imperial, which was paying 10 per cent. More than this, the Committee had taken from the companies their reserve funds. Hon. Members were aware that in the case of all companies, but more especially of those which were engaged in manufacturing, it was necessary that there should be a kind of balancing deposit, to meet any deficiency of dividend which might arise from unforeseen circumstances. Accordingly, in the Act of 1847 it was provided that the gas companies might set apart a portion of their receipts, not exceeding one-tenth of the capital, to form such a fund. By this Bill, however, it was provided that the inspectors should inspect the books and examine the directors of these companies upon oath, and that if it appeared to them that 8 per cent had been earned, no matter to what accidents they might have been subjected, the price of gas should be reduced 6*d.* per 1,000 feet. The profit from the manufacture and sale of gas depended upon the fluctuations in the price of coal, of coke, and of labour, and it was therefore most important that these companies should have reserve funds. In the course of the inquiry the Chairman of the Committee expressed an opinion that it did not depend much upon the price of coal; and, provided the prices of coal and coke maintained their usual relation in point of value that was no doubt the case. If, however, the price of coal rose, and that of coke fell, as was the case during the Russian war, the profit derived from the manufacture of gas would be materially diminished. In consequence of a recent explosion an action had been brought, and was still pending, against the Central Gas Company, in which a claim was made for no less a sum than £60,000. What would be the position of that company if it had no reserved fund? Its annual dividends amounted, in the aggregate, to about £17,000, so that, without the protection which Parliament had wisely given in the shape of a reserved fund, its profits for four years would have to be devoted to the payment of these damages. Again, those who had observed the lime light on the new Westminster Bridge were aware that the profits of the existing gas companies might be entirely destroyed within twelve months by some new discovery. So precarious was the nature of their property; and yet the Select Committee had determined that their dividends should be cut down to the ruinous rate of 2 per cent. Take the case of a company now paying 10 per cent. The Bill said that in future it should not pay more than 8, from which at least 2 per cent must be deducted for depreciation, leaving an apparent dividend of 6 per cent. But the reduction of 6*d.* in the price of gas, which was also part of the Bill, would be equivalent to 4 per cent of dividend, so that in reality, the annual profits of the company could not exceed 2 per cent. It was hardly necessary for him to dwell further upon the operations of such a measure. The honorary secretaries to the league against the companies had publicly stated that the Select Committee had given them far more than they sought at their hands. That was his complaint. If the Committee had given only what the promoters of the Bill asked, little or no harm would have been done, and the gas companies would have been perfectly satisfied, for they were not opposed to, but rather courted, what was called uniform legislation. So far as the Bill sought to control the management of gas companies no fault could be found with it. In 1852 a Bill was introduced to regulate the affairs of water companies, but no attempt was made to interfere with the amount of the dividends payable to the shareholders in those concerns. The water companies still received their 10 per cent, but they were subjected to certain regulations, to which the gas companies would have no objection in their own case. The present Bill, however, was an invasion of the rights of property, and unless the House was prepared to sanction the principle of confiscation, and to place its credit upon the same level as that of defaulting Spain or the repudiating States of America, it was impossible that it could sanction so obnoxious a measure. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the Chairman should leave the chair.

Mr. Staniland

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that, as he had the honour to be the Chairman of the Committee to whom the Bill had been referred, he would naturally be expected to state the circumstances which came under their consideration. He might be permitted to say at the outset that he did not think any five Gentlemen ever undertook a disagreeable task with minds more entirely resolved to do that which they conceived to be their duty. Their only object was, on the one hand, to protect the public, and, on the other to do justice to the gas companies. The hon. Gentleman had based his complaint against the Committee upon two grounds—first and chiefly, the reduction of the maximum dividend payable to the gas companies from 10 to 8 per cent; and, secondly, the reduction of the price of gas from 4s. 6d. to 4s. The truth was, however, that the Committee had not really reduced the profits of the companies from £10 to £8 per cent. In the Gas Clauses Consolidation Act 10 per cent was fixed as the point at which there should be a reduction in the price of gas, and the Select Committee were at first quite prepared to recognize the propriety of adopting that standard, and the more so as 10 per cent was the actual rate of profit made by some of the companies. In referring to the conduct of the Committee, the hon. Gentleman had not fairly stated the case in quoting a single sentence from the short-hand writer's notes as having been used by him (Mr.

Mr. Staniland

S. Estcourt) just as if that had been all he said on that occasion. It was said he had asked how would they do if the Committee fixed the maximum at 8 per cent. But that was not the question. The question was, whether the maximum should or should not include depreciation. The Committee thought it should, but it was represented to them that it would be far better for the companies themselves to deduct a net sum—2 per cent—for depreciation, and to fix the maximum dividend at 8 per cent instead of 10 per cent with depreciation. If the Committee had enjoyed the advantage of the presence of the counsel for the companies from the beginning of their investigation to the end, it was very likely that they would have adhered to their original intention, but on the nineteenth day, when nothing had been positively agreed upon, those gentlemen, in consequence as they said of certain observations which had fallen from the Chairman, intimated their intention to withdraw, and appeal to that House. The Committee might either accept or reject the Bill, but he hardly thought that it would allow the hon. Gentleman to convert it into a tribunal for trying details, which ought to have been tried before the Select Committee, who showed every disposition to receive any amount of information that might be tendered to them. The question whether the preamble should pass was deemed to be a question of detail and to depend on the nature of the clauses, and when the Committee got through two-thirds of their labours the counsel for the opponents of the Bill withdrew. There was one point, respecting which the hon. Gentleman had said but little, though he should have thought that the power proposed to be given to the inspectors would have been denounced. But the Committee should understand how this matter really stood. The whole of these twenty-two companies obtained their Acts upon the understanding that the principle of competition was to be acted upon, and for years competition was carried to a great extent; but in 1856 and 1857, having probably exhausted their resources, they thought it would be better to come to an understanding; and thereupon combination took place of competition. He was ready to bear testimony that there was no ground to blame the conduct of any of the companies, but, if hereafter any vestry or private consumer should have reason to complain of the quality of gas or of the amount supplied, there would be for them, as matters stood at present, no remedy. They could not, if dissatisfied with one company, fall back upon another, because the companies had an agreement among themselves not to compete with one another in assigned districts. Under these circumstances, as competition was put an end to, it was the first duty of the Committee to protect the public, and for this purpose the establishment of inspection appeared the only means. That was the opinion of the Committee, and until the close of their labours they had thought that all the companies were satisfied with the scheme of inspection which the Committee had sketched out. The hon. Gentleman said that the Committee had not heard a great deal of that which the opponents of the Bill had to tell them, and that the House ought to reverse the conclusion of the Committee. He hoped the House would do no such thing, for it was very desirable that the Session should not pass over without legislation on the subject. If the companies, however, being dissatisfied with the decision come to, should desire the Bill to be re-committed to the same Committee for the purpose of supplying fresh information, but not with the view of defeating the measure by a protracted inquiry, he undertook to say that the Committee would fairly and dispassionately consider the new matter. Two things must be agreed on, however; first, that no fresh evidence should be offered, but that what was to be stated should be in the way of information; and next that, if the Bill were again committed, the decision of the Committee would not again be called into question. Considering the great pecuniary interests connected with these companies, the importance of securing protection to the public, and the fact that legislation had been sought for year after year on this question, he thought it would not be an unwise act on the part of the House to refer the subject back to the Committee. He had never served on a Committee with Gentlemen more patient and painstaking than his colleagues, and if the House chose again to recommit the Bill, he should enter on the inquiry with the utmost satisfaction.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Bill had been before the Committee nineteen days, and had received full investigation, with the assistance of counsel. When a measure had been examined at such length, it was not very respectful to those hon. Gentlemen who had undertaken so laborious a duty, and did not tend to the economy of time, when attempts were made to review, in detail, the proceedings of the Committee. No doubt, with a mixed measure of this kind, it was competent to the House to go through it clause by clause, as if it had not been referred to a Committee. But if the labours of a Committee were thus to be thrown away, he hardly knew how the business of the House was to be conducted. Without expressing any opinion on the details of the measure, he would merely observe that circumstances had come to light since the Report of the Committee, which rendered some further consideration of the question as between the consumers and the companies expedient. But he confessed that he thought if the House were to undertake such an arbitration at that period of the Session, it would inevitably result in the loss of the Bill, and in the waste of all the time bestowed upon it by the Select Committee. Under these circumstances, the House, in his opinion, would do well to take the course indicated by the right hon. Gentleman, and refer back the Bill to the Committee, who would then attempt to reconcile these conflicting interests. If that object were accomplished, the Bill might be passed through Committee without much delay; and it would go to the House of Lords and might become law in the present Session. He did not think any useful object would be served by pursuing the debate in detail; and he hoped the Committee would consent at once to report progress, in order to carry into effect the suggestions so wisely and prudently made to it. If so, he would himself move that the Chairman do leave the Chair, on the understanding that some Member of the Committee would give notice for the recommitment of the Bill.

MR. NORRIS said, that with a view to make the passage of the Bill more easy when it came back to the House, he would suggest to the Chairman (Mr. Sotherton Esq.) that he should now state whether the Committee would be likely to leave the question of dividend where the Gas Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845 placed it. If so, he believed all parties would be satisfied.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought it would be most inconvenient if Members of the Committee, before hearing any evidence, or having any opportunity of conferring one with another, should pledge themselves to any particular course. He felt satisfied that they would investigate fairly all the questions which came before them; that they would not think themselves bound by any point of honour to adhere to their previous decision; and that they would regard the whole subject as open to reconsideration.

MR. HENLEY said, he agreed in thinking that the Committee should be perfectly unfettered in their reconsideration of the Bill. At the same time, it should be understood that when the measure came back here, the House would not be pledged to accept it as final. Such great and important principles were at stake, that the House had a right to express its opinion upon them, even at the last stage of the Bill. He had been much struck with the remark of his right hon. Friend (Mr. S. Estcourt) that there were no grounds of complaint against the gas companies, although it was desirable that the public should have protection for the future. That had not been the case with regard to the water companies; for the public had complained most grievously of the quality of the water.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he thought the evidence showed that great complaints were justly made against a particular company which supplied gas on the other side of the water; but not against the other companies. He considered the proposition made by the right hon. Chairman of the Select Committee a fair one, and he believed all questions would be disposed of with the greatest ease.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that with the amount of business which the House had before it, it would be useless to go on with the Bill, or to reappoint the Committee, unless there were some understanding that hon. Members would abate to some extent the right which they possessed of discussing its provisions. He hoped a precedent would not be drawn from the course taken by the counsel for the gas companies in this case, who, when they found they had not got a Committee to their liking withdrew from before it, and transferred their arguments to the floor of the House of Commons. The result of such a course, if persevered in, would be utterly to destroy the system of Select Committees. Hybrid Bills of this nature were attended with the double disadvantage that they entailed enormous expenses on their promoters, without in return obtaining any certainty that the Report of the Select Committee would be followed up by legislation. They had all the inconvenience and delay of public measures with all the cost of private Bills.

Sir George Lewis

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he had no interest whatever as a shareholder in any gas company, but, residing as he did in the Metropolis for seven months in each year, he felt it to be of the utmost importance that the question should be settled. There were clauses in the Bill which arbitrarily interfered, as he thought, with the gas companies, and he regarded the proposition to refer it back to the Select Committee as fair and reasonable. At the same time he should be sorry to see the principle established, even though a measure might come from the most respectable Committee, that it was to be passed in silence by the House. Gas companies differed from other associations in one important particular. With other undertakings the purchase of shares was optional with the public; but they were compelled to go to the gas companies, and these ought therefore to be conducted on principles just towards the public as well as to their own proprietors.

MR. STANILAND said, he was perfectly willing to withdraw his Motion on the understanding that the companies should be at liberty to place their case fully not only before the Committee but also, if necessary, before the House.

MR. NORTH observed that the Select Committee had declined to enter into the charges against the gas companies, and had not, therefore, pronounced a verdict either of condemnation or acquittal.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, whenever a Member stood up to advocate public interests, in which those of his constituents happened to be involved, he was at once accused of seeking popularity, and of acting with a view to electioneering interests. The best answer he could give to such a charge was that the subject of the present measure had been anxiously discussed for four Sessions; there had been three Select Committees, and he had been a party to two compromises with the representatives of gas companies. He was quite willing to have taken the Bill in the shape in which it had come back from the Select Committee, but he would not object to their going into the whole question again. He had no desire to interfere unjustly with those who had invested capital in gas establishments, but he thought the public ought to be protected against their arbitrary conduct. Judging, however, from the excitement which had been going on in the lobby outside for the last fortnight, it was probable that nothing would satisfy the companies but trying what really was the determination of the vestries, but if they went up to the House of Lords they would find the vestries perfectly ready to fight it out there.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, it was a mistake to suppose that he had ever maintained that the House would be bound by the decision of the Committee. If the hon. Member for Limerick would say that he approved the scheme now before the House, then he should be perfectly satisfied that it would be a Bill likely to carry out the desired objects.

MR. F. W. RUSSELL said, the companies could not receive that amount of justice which they required unless the Bill went upstairs with a full understanding that there was to be a full and fair inquiry, and that further evidence was to be taken if necessary. Without that understanding it could not be expected that the companies would assist in carrying the Bill. At present there were many points in the Bill most objectionable to the companies—particularly that relating to inspectors, which would take away the entire control of the companies from the directors, and to vest it in officers who had no interest whatever in their prosperity.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that after the declaration of the hon. Gentleman it would be useless to waste time by sending the Bill upstairs again. The case of the promoters had taken fifteen days, and it was presumable that the case of the opponents would last the same time, and this being the 10th of July it was easy to see that it would not be possible to get the Bill up to the House of Lords before the last day fixed by them for receiving Bills from the Commons. The object was clearly not settlement but delay, and it would be better to fight the matter out at once.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed. [No Report.]

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read. House in Committee.

Clause 3 (Certain Deeds not to be void if enrolled within twelve months from passing of Act).

MR. ADDERLEY moved the insertion in the clause after the words "void or voidable" of the words "except as against the donor or settlor, or his representatives." The provision made by the clause as it stood was that no deed or assurance connected with the Roman Catholic religion made subsequently to the 9th of George II., should be "void or voidable" by reason of the same not having been perfected or enrolled if twelve months after the passing of the present Act it should have been enrolled in the Court of Chancery. The object was to compel enrolment. The Roman Catholics, however, would rather not have the deeds enrolled, so that they might not be brought under the supervision of the Charity Commissioners. If the clause were allowed to remain in its present state the charities would be made valid without any control.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND was afraid the Amendment would have the effect of defeating the object which the Bill was intended to realize, as it would enable the "donor, settlor, or his representatives" to take advantage either of the provision against superstitious uses, or of the non-enrolment of those Roman Catholic charities which were not enrolled, simply because at the time of the grant they were illegal. It was not intended by the measure to place the Roman Catholics on any better footing with respect to their charities than ordinary dissenters from the Established Church. The object was to relieve them from certain disabilities imposed upon them by certain statutes which the Legislature had repealed. Before 1832 all provisions for Roman Catholic charities were void by law, and, in consequence of that, the deeds relating to them were not enrolled. By the Act of 1832 the charities were rendered valid, but, subsequently to that, a decision was given by the Master of the Rolls that any charity containing bequests for masses for the souls of deceased persons were superstitious, within the meaning of the Act of Edward VI., and were consequently void. That decision had never been acquiesced in. It had been very much questioned by recent decisions of the present Master of the Rolls, and was not in accordance with the law in Ireland. The object of the Bill, therefore, was simply to place Roman Catholics under the general law, and the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman would probably have the effect of rendering that object nugatory. He trusted the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he did not think that the Amendment would have the effect supposed. The clause under consideration was simply a provision with reference to Roman Catholic charities which had come into existence between the passing of the mortmain Act of George II. and the present time. The enrolment would be nugatory, and the simplest way would be to leave the trusts unenrolled, and to allow them to be valid without enrolment, except as against the heirs at law of the donors.

MR. LOWE said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had not quite understood the effect of the Amendment. Hitherto all Roman Catholic charities were void if not enrolled. By this clause, however, Roman Catholic charities made since Sir J. Jekyll's Act, in the reign of George II., would not be void against the donors for not being enrolled, in case they were enrolled within twelve months after the passing of the Act. The right hon. Gentleman's Amendment would virtually enact that, even although they might be enrolled within twelve months after the Act, still they should be void against the donors for not being enrolled under Sir J. Jekyll's Act. Such an Amendment would defeat the purpose of the Act; and he hoped the House would not agree to it.

MR. ADDERLEY observed that the right hon. Gentleman was wholly mistaken as to the effect of his Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he believed that the Attorney General intended by the first clause to provide against the difficulty which had been suggested. There might be and, in fact, there were Roman Catholic charities which were applied contrary to the wishes of the donor, and the question was, would they give the donor or his representatives the right to have these abuses corrected. There was a case, for instance, where a Roman Catholic priest had built a chapel, but this charity had, by the exercise of the spiritual authority of his superiors been entirely defeated, and his person had virtually been deprived of the benefits of his own charity, and of his means of livelihood during his life time, because he refused to transfer it to trustees, to whom he objected. If they had any regard for religious freedom they would give power to correct such abuses. He thought that if there was any danger of the representatives of the donors, who were not Roman Catholics, seeking unfairly to vitiate the trust, that might be prevented by words being introduced giving certain powers to the Charity Commissioners and to the Court of Chancery. Such a provision was introduced into the Bill of last year. He certainly would vote for the Amendment giving to the representatives of the donors of these trusts power to have them readjusted where they had been altered, perverted, or needed amendment to render them conformable to English law, subject to the control he had mentioned. This was the substance of the Bill of last Session that it would be introduced into the measure now before the House.

Mr. Adderley

MR. PULLER said, the object of the measure was to place the Roman Catholics on the same ground as other Dissenters. He understood the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) to agree to that; but now that it was proposed to bring these charities, which had been illegal, within the pale of the law, it was hard to make the trustees liable to the donor or his representatives. Whilst under repression the Catholics had had recourse to concealment, and he thought that there should be no power to revoke the trust because there had been no enrolment.

MR. NEWDEGATE remarked that the evidence before the Mortmain Committee proved that there had been continual misappropriation of these trusts, and, therefore, it was most important to give power to the original donors and their representatives to deal with this state of things, subject to proper control.

MR. SELWYN said, he believed that the difficulty arose entirely from the postponement of the first clause. If that clause were framed as the Committee clearly intended, the third clause would do in its present shape. He would, therefore, suggest that his right hon. Friend should postpone his Amendment until after the first clause had been brought up again. The House had properly determined that there should be some legislation on these charities, so that the practice of having three or four sets of deeds, to be produced according to circumstances, might be put an end to. The difficulty, would, perhaps, best be obviated by his moving that the first clause be rejected, and that the second clause of the Bill of 1859, introduced by the present Home Secretary, should be substituted for the first clause. If that were substituted his right hon. Friend's Amendment would be unnecessary.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he would accede to the suggestion of his hon. and learned Friend, and would not press his Amendment.

MR. PULLER said, he would move the omission of certain words in the clause, the effect of which would be to place Roman Catholics on precisely the same footing with Protestants as respected the statute of mortmain.

Amendment proposed, in line 15, to leave out the words "made, perfected, or."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS submitted that the clause had been correctly drawn, and was calculated to meet the defect that existed in the Mortmain Act.

MR. SELWYN said, he could see no reason why the Roman Catholic charities should be put upon a more advantageous position than those of the Church of England or any other charities, as the proposed Bill was calculated to do.

MR. LOWE said, that if a man were required to obey a law he ought to receive some protection. The Roman Catholics were outlaws as regarded their charitable testamentary dispositions. The law gave them no protection. Was it, then, fair or just, when there was one provision of the law with which they could not comply, that they should be required to comply with any other provision?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the object of the House was not to place Roman Catholic charities in a better position than any other charities, but on a par with them, and the object would be fully attained by adopting the Amendment.

MR. WHALLEY complained of the course which the Government had pursued in reference to this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had last year pledged himself to introduce a measure, but it was not now introduced on Government responsibility. He (Mr. Whalley) thought the better course would be that this Bill should be withdrawn and a new Bill introduced next Session by the Government.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, when the Roman Catholic charities were created, the Mortmain Act being then in force, there were two principal provisions of it under which any such deed would have fallen. One was the provision that it should be executed at least a year prior to the death of the testator, and the other was the enrolment with two witnesses. The object of the clause was to cure the defect of non-enrolment. It had been urged in curing that defect they ought not to cure the other. But what possible inducement was there to Roman Catholics to fulfil the one condition if they could not fulfil both? Unless both were fulfilled the deed would be invalid. The two conditions could not be severed, and if they cured the one defect, it was equally just that they should cure the other.

MR. ROLT denied that the reasoning of the right hon. Gentleman applied. Of the two conditions he mentioned one had reference to the mode of executing the deed creating the charity—the other to the question of capacity to do the thing at all. The prohibition in the Mortmain Act did not apply to Roman Catholics especially, but to all "languishing and dying persons." Why, therefore, should Roman Catholic charities because they were to be relieved from the results of the non-fulfilment of the one condition be relieved with regard to the other, the non-fulfilment of which amounted in any case to a positive incapacity?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL contended that the reasoning of the Home Secretary was perfectly correct, because, as the law stood, under the Act of George II. it would be perfectly useless for a Roman Catholic to comply with all the other conditions, if the one condition of enrolment was not complied with. There was therefore no inducement to the Roman Catholic to comply with the condition of making his will at the legal period.

MR. ADDERLEY observed that the Mortmain Act required several conditions to make a deed valid, and he did not think that enrolment should be permitted to cover all invalidities.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the necessity for some limitation was shown by the experience of all Roman Catholic countries, where, if gifts from "languishing and dying persons" were permitted without restraint, a great portion of the land became lost for all public purposes.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 71; Noes 49: Majority 22.

MR. HENLEY said, the House had been sitting thirteen hours, and was to meet again at twelve o'clock. It was, moreover, quite clear that the Bill could not go through Committee without the presence of the Attorney General to bring up the first clause, and it was only reasonable that they should now go home. He would, therefore, move that the Chairman report progress.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the right hon. Gentleman's Motion was a reasonable one. The only question was whether they might not finish this clause before progress was reported.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 37; Noes 67: Majority 30.

An Amendment was made in the clause. Clause agreed to.

House resumed. Committee report Progress; to sit again on Friday.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, July 11, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^o Turnpike Acts Continuance; Copyhold and Inclosure Commissions, &c.; Turnpike Trusts Arrangements; Highway Rates Act Continuance.

CENSUS (ENGLAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Schedules to be filled up. Penalty for neglect).

MR. BAINES said, that he had to move that the words "religious profession" be omitted from the clause. He thought that the number of petitions which had been presented to the House that day—and indeed for some time past—from various parts of the country, and he might say from all denominations of religion, was a very clear proof that it was undesirable that the demand which it was proposed to make on every householder in this country should be made in the forthcoming Census. He might venture to add that on no other occasion had the sentiments of Gentlemen in that House, especially those sitting on his side, corresponded more exactly with those of their constituents than upon this question. It would be remembered that in the original form of this clause the words "religious profession" were inserted, and a penalty varying from £1 to £5 was applied to the inquiry under this head, as well as to all other inquiries proposed to be made to householders. It was well known to the House that since then an intimation had been made by the Home Secretary of his intention to withdraw the penalty which attached to the words "religious profession;" but he thought he was justified in saying that although in one respect the Bill became less objectionable in consequence of the penalty being withdrawn, yet in another respect it became still more objectionable, because the Returns that would be obtained by an inquiry thus made would necessarily be extremely defective and entirely worthless. To make the inquiry of householders concerning their "religious profession" was a thing new in this country. It had never taken place on the occasion of any Census being taken in England, Scotland, or Ireland. On one special occasion—not the decennial Census—an inquiry of that nature was made in Ireland, but the result was not of that satisfactory nature to induce the Government to have determined to make that inquiry in the Irish Census Bill of this year. It was felt not alone by Dissenters, but by Churchmen, that to inquire into the religious profession of individuals was objectionable, both on the grounds of feeling and of principle. He had heard individually a greater number of indignant objections expressed by Members of that House, who belonged to the Established Church, against this clause, than he had heard from those belonging to various Dissenting bodies. Members for very large constituencies had stated that the objections proceeded from Churchmen as much as from Dissenters, and in some cases from clergymen of the Church of England. Although he was a Dissenter, he had not taken up this question merely on the grounds of Dissenters. He had stated on the second reading that he objected to it on general grounds, and he desired to see perfect fairness and entire equity for all religious bodies in this country. It was supposed by some persons that those who advocated the opinions on the subject which he entertained were actuated by a desire to conceal their religious belief; but no supposition could be more erroneous, as was demonstrated by the fact that they who were most strenuous in their opposition to the proposed inquiry were men who every day proclaimed their faith to the world. It was, then, upon no such unworthy ground as that, that they objected to the clause; they did so because—with what seemed to be an instinctive feeling in the minds of Englishmen—they deemed it a duty to resist an authoritative demand on the part of the Government upon a point which they regarded as beyond the legitimate scope of civil interference. The civil governor had a right to inquire into the particulars of the civil condition of the people, such as age, sex, occupation, birth-place, &c., but he had no right to intrude into the domain of conscience. It was with Dissenters a matter of principle to maintain the freedom, independence, and purity of the Church of Christ, by keeping it free from State control; they neither admitted the authority nor received the patronage or pay of the State; and our history recorded but too many instances of persecution and intolerance to justify the jealousy on the subject by which they were animated. He was happy to know that the intolerance of former days had passed away, but there were still relics of injustice, as in the church rates, which compelled men to pay to a Church to which they did not belong. It was therefore that the Dissenters were united on the present occasion as one man in opposition to the proposed declaration—the Wesleyan body, who sympathized to the greatest extent with the Established Church, being the most zealous in the cause. But there was another objection to the clause as it stood, which many excellent men entertained, and that was, that, inasmuch as they were in the habit of attending a place of worship belonging to the Established Church in the morning and a Dissenting chapel in the evening, they would have a difficulty in subscribing to a particular form of declaration as to their religious profession. It would not be easy to state the religious profession of children of every age. Some persons who had not the slightest disinclination to proclaim their own religious sentiments, were indisposed to ask their guests and the inmates of their houses to submit to a similar ordeal. Again, it was quite obvious that the proposed inquiry would operate very invidiously in the case of one class of those inmates, who were willing to conform to all the usages of the family which they served, but who would not unnaturally dislike being called upon to make a declaration which in their opinion might tend to prejudice their employer against them—supposing their belief to be different from his—or subject them to annoyance on the part of their fellow servants. There was a still stronger argument against it, arising from the number of those who, judging from all outward manifestations, were of no religion whatever. In 1851 a calculation was made from the returns of attendance on places of worship on the census Sunday, as appeared in the very able Report of Mr. Horace Mann, according to which no less than 5,200,000 persons who were in a condition to attend places of worship in England and Wales were found not to have attended on the census Sunday, a very large proportion of whom, it was feared, were habitual non-attenders. He should feel strongly against asking men what was their religious profession when he knew they had none to make, as it would be tempting them to say that which was delusive and false. Besides, in a considerable number of cases, he feared answers might be given of a very undesirable character, such as outrageous protestations against religion, which no one could desire to see recorded upon a public document. He therefore thought that between those who could not and those who, on conscientious grounds, would not, answer the questions, the majority would give no answer, and returns obtained under such circumstances would be utterly destitute of all value. Another objection, too, existed in the great power given to the enumerators to put down such answers as they thought fit to those who did not fill up that column, and which power, necessarily given to a certain extent, and unexceptionable as regarded the ordinary returns of the census, would be open to grave objections with respect to the returns of religious professions. The enumerators would have their own prepossessions and prejudices, and might put down such answers as they thought fit with reference to religious profession in the case of those who did not fill up the schedules themselves. Such a discretion would be altogether unsafe, and must be attended with unsatisfactory results. It might be said that similar inquiries were made as to religious profession in various European countries; but those countries were either despotic or the Government paid the clergy of every denomination. But a very different state of things existed here. Nonconformists only wished to be let alone; they did not ask for and would not receive the money of the State, and the Government had, therefore, no right to put questions to them as to their religious profession. In the United States, which bore the strongest resemblance to England of any foreign country, a return was made of the number of churches, and of the amount of accommodation in sittings, but a man was never asked to make a statement of his religious profession. It had been stated that in the last religious census the form had been suggested by Dissenters and was used for their profit and benefit alone, and to the prejudice of the Established Church. He appealed to the right hon. Baronet, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, then the Home Secretary, who brought in the Census Bill of 1851, and to the then Under Secretary of State, now the head of that department, who also took an active part in carrying that measure, whether there was the slightest truth in the allegation. He utterly denied it, and challenged contradiction when he declared that no such suggestion ever was given by the Dissenters, who, in fact, had nothing whatever to do with it. The suggestion was made by the Registrar-General, and he would read the words of the Report, in proof of his assertion. In the first page Mr. Horace Mann, addressing the Registrar-General, said—

Sir George Lewis

“It will doubtless be within your recollection that, when making preparation for the General Census, and determining what information was most worthy to be gathered by the aid of the complete machinery then specially to be provided, it appeared to you exceedingly desirable to seize upon so rare an opportunity in order to procure correct intelligence on two important subjects of much public interest and controversy—namely, the number and varieties and capabilities of (1) the religious, and (2) the scholastic institutions of the country.”

The Registrar-General was a Churchman, and he was assisted by another member of the Establishment, who drew up the Report—a most honourable and fair Report, every page of which bore marks of impartiality. The statement that these returns were not exactly fair to the Established Church was destitute of all real substance; and any candid mind looking into the returns must be satisfied that there was no unfairness whatever, either in the mode of collecting the returns or in the result ultimately presented. Certain instances were quoted which, until they were examined into, gave some slight colour to the impeachment. For instance, in a publication issued by the Cambridge Church Defence Society, it was stated (no doubt for his special benefit) that in the borough of Leeds there were returned only 200 as the number of sittings in the chapels of the Wesleyan Reformers, whereas the attendance was given as 650 in the morning, 723 in the afternoon, and 1,030 in the evening. But the Report itself explained that seeming inconsistency at a glance. Only the free sittings in the Wesleyan chapels, 200 in number, were given. The column for appropriated seats, probably three or four times that number, was not filled up. He thought it likely that the four chapels of the Wesleyan Reformers would contain an aggregate of 1,600 or 2,000 sittings. Another charge made was with reference to the Latter Day Saints, whose number of sittings was given as 1,220, while the attendance in the morning was given as 3,644; afternoon, 365; and evening, 1,000. But the fact was that this inconsistency arose from the transposition of two lines of figures, by which the numbers belonging to the Roman Catholics were given to the Latter Day Saints, and vice versa. All the figures he had quoted belonged to the Roman Catholics. And the excess of attendance over sittings in the Catholic chapels arose from the notorious fact, that in the mornings service was performed several times to successive congregations, and that many of the worshippers did not sit but stand. But he challenged the most minute scrutiny of the tables to detect the least dishonesty or attempt to impose on the public. A reference to the aggregate, as stated by Dissenters and the Church of England, would at once show that there was nothing like dishonesty, but, on the contrary, the most perfect honesty in the returns made. The general sum of the matter was this:—the number of sittings in the Church of England was given at 5,317,915, and in the chapels of other denominations 4,894,648. That was a very near approximation, giving a majority of 400,000 or 500,000 to the Established Church. The estimated attendance on the Census Sunday in the Church of England was 3,773,474, and in the chapels belonging to other denominations 3,487,578; the attendance in each case bearing to the Church accommodation as near as possible the proportion of 71 per cent. There was a mere fractional difference between the two. This afforded internal evidence of the most decisive kind of the honesty and substantial accuracy of those who made these returns. There were two modes in which a census applying at all to the religious sentiments of a country might be made—the one proposed by this Bill, the other that adopted with perfect success in 1851. He would read to the House a passage from the Census Report of 1851 on this subject:—

Mr. Baines

“There are two methods of pursuing a statistical inquiry with respect to the religion of a people. You may either ask each individual, directly, what particular form of religion he professes; or, you may collect such information as to the religious acts of individuals as will equally, though indirectly, lead to the same result. The former method was adopted, some few years ago, in Ireland, and is generally followed in the Continental States when such investigations as the present are pursued. At the recent Census it was thought advisable to take the latter course partly because it had a less inquisitorial aspect,—but especially because it was considered that the outward conduct of persons furnishes a better guide to their religious state than can be gained by merely vague professions. In proportion, it was thought, as people truly are connected with particular sects or churches, will be their activity in raising buildings in which to worship, and their diligence in afterwards frequenting them; but where there is an absence of such practical regard for a religious creed, but little weight can be attached to any purely formal acquiescence. This inquiry, therefore, was confined to obvious facts relating to two subjects. 1. The amount of ACCOMMODATION which the people have provided for religious worship; and, 2. The number of persons, as ATTENDANTS, by whom this provision is made use of."

There were many weighty reasons in favour of making such collective returns of religious statistics as were made on the last occasion. They formed a record of one class of the public institutions of the country. The churches and chapels were already registered, and they merely wanted in addition the amount of accommodation and the numbers attending them on a particular day, or an average extending over a certain length of time. Religious statistics of this kind were desirable and highly valuable. They were of use to the historian, the statesman, and most of all to the philanthropist and man of religion. They exhibited the comparative numbers of the different sects in the country,—as well as the comparative progress of the population, and of their means of religious accommodation and observance. If we had a Census in 1861 on the same plan as that of 1851, the most valuable and important conclusions could be drawn as to the progress or otherwise of the amount of accommodation provided by the various religious bodies. Between 1831 and 1851 there was an increase in population in England and Wales of 27 per cent, and in the accommodation for religious worship of 42 per cent, showing a most gratifying amount of religious activity in the different churches. From such a return, too, could be learned the less gratifying, but more salutary, knowledge of the deficiency still existing of religious accommodation. It could be learned also how far a defective attendance at places of worship was caused by want of accommodation, and how far it was to be ascribed to a want of disposition to attend. The returns for 1861 would show how far the religious zeal of the community had been stimulated by the Bishops, clergy, and laity of the Church, and by the ministers and members of other denominations, in providing more abundant and adequate religious accommodation; they would also show, not merely in the general but in precise localities, where the existing deficiencies existed, and serve as a guide to the efforts to supply them. The returns before the House afforded the most triumphant evidence of progress in the means of religious worship—far greater than in population, and the most gratifying—he might say stupendous efforts which had been made both in the Establishment and out of it to supply means of religious worship to those in want of them. From the whole facts might be drawn one salutary lesson. It did so happen that there was something approaching to a balance between the members of the Establishment and the Nonconformist sects; he thought that fact should teach them to respect the power of each other, and the efforts each was making to advance the grand cause of religion and the welfare of the country. He had never drawn any mere sectarian conclusion from these returns. He looked on them as valuable for far higher ends; and he believed, if his Amendment were adopted, they would, as in 1851, have returns the ultimate effect of which would be to stimulate both Churchmen and Dissenters to a wholesome and honourable competition, highly favourable to the general interests of the people of this country. He, for one, would appeal to Dissenters, and he was sure every gentleman connected with the Establishment would put it to Churchmen, that they should make these returns with the most perfect and undeviating accuracy, remembering under what sanction, and for what high and sacred purposes, they were designed. He hoped he had said enough to induce the Committee to adhere to the mode of the religious Census adopted in 1851, and he begged now to move the first Amendment of which he had given notice, to strike out of the 4th clause the words "religious profession."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, as I am responsible for the Bill on which the hon. Member for Leeds has moved the present Amendment, as the subject to which his Amendment relates has excited great attention and interest in a large part of the community, and as the proposal was made by me quite deliberately and with as full a consideration as I was then able to give to it of all the consequences of the provision, I trust the Committee will bear with me while I lay before them the grounds on which that proposal was made. I must begin by stating that in my opinion the presumption must be considered to be in favour of including religion among the subjects comprehended in a census. It is true that it has not been the practice in this country to require any statement of religious profession. I am quite aware that it is so; but I wish to bring under the attention of the Committee that the general practice of civilized States in which differences of religion exist is to make an inquiry as to that fact; and persons on the Continent who have paid attention to statistical subjects, and the general principles which regulate them, have recommended that religious profession should be included. I hold in my hand an extract from the decisions arrived at by the Congress at Brussels, and the extent to which the principles have been followed in different European States. It says—"V. The census should comprise the Christian and surname, age, sex, language, occupation, and religious profession of every individual." The principle is adopted in Austria, Bavaria, Belgium, Denmark, France, [Ironical cheers.] I am not aware what there is to elicit those cheers. I am merely reading a list of those countries on the Continent in which the principle of the clause is adopted. Besides those I have named there are Prussia, Saxony, Sweden, and Wurtemberg. The principle is not adopted in Holland and Spain; the reason given with regard to the latter country is that the details are obtained through the civil administration. I believe it is also the fact that a religious census is taken in some of the British Colonies, and, indeed, it is stated in the Report of Mr. Horace Mann that a method of inquiry as to the particular form of religious profession of the people has been adopted in Ireland, and is generally followed in continental States where such investigations as the present are pursued. Therefore, I must maintain, with great deference to hon. Gentlemen who cheer at the mention of particular States on the Continent, that the general practice of civilized countries is to include religion in a census of the population. I will state also that we have before Parliament a paper particularly relating to the subject of the religious census of Prussia. In 1834 my noble Friend the First Lord of the Treasury, then Foreign Secretary, addressed a letter to the British Minister at Berlin, requesting that he would transmit details of the census then about to take place in Prussia, where there is a perfect system of religious toleration, rendering that country a model for imitation in that respect, and showing that there was no necessary connection between intolerance and a religious census. This is the answer of the head of the department at Berlin to the first question, relative to the mode of taking a religious census:—

Sir George Lewis

"In the kingdom of Prussia a census of the inhabitants is made every three years, in which the several religious persuasions are distinguished. The last was completed at the end of the year 1831, and its result will be stated below. At the conclusion of the present year, 1834, another census will take place, which is already prepared, the results of which will not, however, be wholly arranged till the middle of next year. In these censuses religious relations are only distinguished in so far as they relate to civil matters. Hence, the census in progress will contain only four classes of inhabitants, according to religious distinction. The first division is into Christians and non-Christians; of the latter there are in Prussia only Jews, as the Mahomedan Tartars who became Prussian subjects in the year 1793 were ceded with the province of New East-Prussia in the year 1807, and are now Russian subjects. The Christians again fall into two great divisions, according as they recognize, or not, a foreign ecclesiastical superior,—namely, the Pope. The first are under the head of 'Roman Catholic Christians.' The latter would be wholly comprised under the head of 'Protestant Christians,' if the doctrines of the Mennonites, or Baptists, did not influence their civil relations, which makes it necessary to distinguish them, inasmuch as they refuse to perform military service and to take oaths. Other religious sects, which, like the Quakers in England, hold the same doctrines, form no distinct congregations, have obtained from the Government no exemption from the general duties of a citizen, and are only allowed to dwell in the country as aliens, whose liberty of conscience, however, is not interfered with. Hence arises the following classification of the different religious professions, namely:—1, Protestant Christians; 2, Roman Catholic Christians; 3, Mennonites; 4, Jews. Commerce and military connections have, indeed, brought into the Prussian dominions a very small number of Christians belonging to the Greek Church, who are recognized by the Government as a separate religious society; but, as their number does not amount at the most to more than 200 or 300, it has hitherto not been deemed necessary to give them a separate head in the statistical tables, and they have been included under the Roman Catholics, as they are only considered by the Church of Rome as schismatics, not as heretics. Nevertheless, the statistical department has now been directed to cause them to be counted separately; this will be done for the first time in the forthcoming census. The number of inhabitants who belong to each of the four religious persuasions first mentioned is shown in the annexed survey, according to the census at the end of the year 1831, for each circle. By this survey it appears, in general, that the Prussian State at the end of the year 1831 contained 7,941,721 Protestant Christians, 4,915,153 Roman Catholic Christians, 14,756 Mennonites, and 167,330 Jews."

The Committee will see that this completely exhausts the enumeration of the religious denominations and religious professions of the people of Prussia, and therefore all those difficulties enumerated by the hon. Member for Leeds, and which seemed to me rather in the nature of bugbears, would disappear in the face of a regular enumeration. Well, there has been the example of a religious census taken in the United Kingdom. It was not taken in England and Scotland, but in Ireland, and, although it was not taken under an Act of Parliament, but under a Royal Commission, yet it was a complete religious census, and an example of what a religious census would be in this country taken under the authority of an Act of Parliament. In truth the precedent rather goes against the argument of my hon. Friend, because, being taken simply under the authority of a Royal Commission, and there being no compulsory power, while public opinion was very much excited as to the numerical difference between the Roman Catholics and Protestants, the circumstances were eminently unfavourable to a religious census. Now, I hold in my hand extracts from the Report of the Commission on Public Instruction in Ireland, presented in 1835. The Commission say—

“Although from our inquiries being in every case held on the spot, the Commissioner was usually unable to give the parties concerned more than a few days’ notice of his visit, yet we are happy to state that our inquiries were almost invariably attended by the clergy of the established Church”—

And here let it be observed that the clergy of the Established Church in Ireland may almost be regarded as a Dissenting body, as they represent a small portion of the population, and, therefore, would not naturally be eager to give assistance for such a census,—

“and very generally, especially in country parishes, by the clergy of other denominations; and that we found almost universally a disposition prevailing in all quarters to aid our investigations, and to furnish us with the information which it was our duty to obtain.”

The Commissioners also say—

“In numerous instances, however, the officiating clergy of the parish, and more especially of the Established Church, in accordance with the suggestion contained in the circular letter from which an extract has been above given, tendered at the place of holding the local inquiry, an original census taken by them or under their direction, comprising either the whole or a portion of the present population of the parish, distinguishing the religious persuasions to which the individuals therein set down respectively belonged.”

They add—and this passage is material—that,

“On the whole we present to your Majesty the Census of Ireland for the past year, with the full confidence that it affords a very close approximation to the truth in a matter where perfect accuracy is nearly unattainable. If, however, there is any part of our census which exhibits the true state of the population more precisely than another, it is that which relates to the members of the Established Church; as not only the comparative smallness of their numbers in some parts of the country and their social position render them more easy of enumeration, but in a large number of parishes we have been enabled to return the Protestants of the Established Church, on the authority of censuses made for the occasion by their own clergymen, and carefully investigated at the local inquiry held by the Visiting Commissioners.”

This is the general conclusion at which the Commissioners arrive:—

“It appears that the population of Ireland, as deducible from the census which we now offer consists of 852,064 of the Established Church, 6,427,712 Roman Catholics, 642,356 Presbyterians, and 21,808 other Protestant Dissenters, making in the whole 7,943,940 persons. But it is observable,”—

I beg the attention of the Committee to this point,—

“It is observable that in proceedings upon the Census of 1831, the religion of 18,951 persons included therein could not now be ascertained, on account of changes of residence which had taken place since that year, and the difficulty of observing their actual domicile.”

This census was made in 1834, upon the enumeration-books actually obtained in 1831. Therefore, the difficulty of ascertaining the religion of those 18,951 persons arose on account of their change of residence; but it was not stated that there was any difficulty in ascertaining the religious persuasion of each person whose residence had not changed.

“Of the persons so omitted a considerable portion were doubtless supplied by means of original censuses leaving, however, a residue which ought not to be altogether overlooked in estimating the total population of Ireland for 1834.”

I think the statement I have read to the Committee will show that, at all events, in taking the religious census of Ireland in 1834, none of these gigantic difficulties which my hon. Friend has conjured up were found to exist; and I am not aware that there is any fundamental difference between Ireland in 1834 and Great Britain in 1860. But, in considering the course to be pursued in the present year, I had to decide before I laid this Bill on the table whether I should adopt the plan that was followed in 1851, or propose a general census of religious persuasions. That a beginning had been made in 1851 in respect to a religious census is apparent from the fact that my hon. Friend, as well as many other Non-conformists have occasionally adverted to it, as affording the means of a numerical comparison between the Established Church and the Protestant Dissenters of this country. ["No, no!"] Surely my hon. Friend said he inferred from the return of the persons attending religious worship on a given Sunday, that there is about an equality of numbers between the Established Church and the Protestant Dissenters in England. He, therefore, as well as many others, seeks to use the return as a general census of religious persuasions.

I had to inquire, then, whether this was a satisfactory way of taking a general religious census of the population, and whether I should propose to Parliament a repetition of the method of 1851, or the plan embodied in this Bill. Upon matured consideration, I decided against recommending a repetition of the plan of 1851, and in favour of the one now before us. It appeared to me, in the first place, that the introduction drawn up by Mr. Horace Mann, although, no doubt, a work of considerable research and ability, goes into matters quite foreign to the statistical precision and dryness, if I may so, suitable to those returns. For instance, he gives a description of the religion of the Druids, and passes in historical review the religious progress of this country—even furnishing a particular account of the religious opinions of the Swedenborgians, the Mormons, and various other sects; information which is certainly interesting, but hardly falls within the limits of a statistical classification of the population. There is, moreover, a reprint of the Thirty-nine Articles, which I should scarcely have thought necessary to be laid on the table of this House. It seemed to me, therefore, that the system adopted on the former occasion was one altogether more lax and less accurate than was requisite for statistical purposes. It is obvious that an enumeration of the persons who attend places of worship on a given Sunday, even if quite accurate, must lead to very fallacious results, if relied on as the basis of a religious census. The same person may have attended more than once at the same place of worship or at different places of worship on the same day. Others may be included who are simply present from accident or curiosity, and who do not belong to the congregation in any way; while many who belong to particular denominations may be absent from various causes. Again, the total number of persons returned as having attended churches and chapels on the Sunday in question is only 7,261,000, thus avowedly leaving a very large proportion of the population wholly unaccounted for.

Now, nothing is further from my intention than to bring charges of deliberate dishonesty against those who made these returns of attendance at public worship. I doubt not they were made with perfect honesty and, also, as far as possible, with perfect correctness. But what I object to is the method, which is loose and inaccurate, and necessarily leading to fallacious inferences. What we want to get at is an account of the religious profession of the population. This House, as a civil legislature, has nothing whatever to do with the punctual performance of religious duties, or with the private opinions of each person. It may be conceivable, for example, that an individual who attends the worship of the Established Church, who calls himself a member of that Church, and brings up his family in that communion, may nevertheless be an Arian or a Socinian. That is a possible contingency. Yet it is a fact with which we, the Parliament of England, have no concern whatever. All that we are entitled to ask a man is, "What is the religious faith of which you make a public profession?" It is a matter of indifference to the civil Government whether he attends regularly at a particular place of religious worship. All we wish to know, if I may say so, is under what religious banner he is enlisted, and to what religious persuasion he ascribes himself and brings up his children.

My hon. Friend says there is a great difficulty with regard to the religion of children. Now, this is a knot which the State cuts with great facility. Ask the Court of Chancery how it can tell the religion of a child. That tribunal has no difficulty in laying down rules as to the religion in which children who are its wards are to be educated. We cannot enter into metaphysical questions as to how the religion of a child originates. It is sufficient for us to regard the children of parents connected with a particular persuasion as also belonging to that persuasion. On that principle all religious censuses have been made. On that plan the Irish Census of 1834 was framed, and no objection was practically taken to it. For these reasons it seemed to me not to be desirable to repeat the method followed in 1851, in taking the religious census—for that was, in fact, a religious census, however imperfect it may have been. As such it was always used, and it has been over and over again quoted as exhibiting the numerical proportions of the different religious sects. It must be admitted that we have proposed a simple mode of ascertaining the religious profession or denomination of each individual.

Sir George Lewis

I have heard it answered that I individually have some wish to give an unfair advantage to the Church of England, and to do something which was hostile and unpalatable to the Dissenting body of this country and Scotland. I can assure the Committee in the most positive manner, and with the most perfect sincerity, that I have no such intention. No such idea ever crossed my mind. I desire to be perfectly neutral as between the different religious persuasions. I simply wish that the truth may be ascertained, and it appeared to me that the plan proposed by the Bill was the most direct and effectual mode of ascertaining it. Certainly I was quite unprepared for the expression of feeling which has since occurred. I can only say that I suggested to my right hon. Friend now the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, in 1851, when the census was under consideration, the expediency of extending it to religion, and I most distinctly recollect there was then a general belief that such a census would be particularly unpalatable to the Established Church. I was certainly under the impression that a census which would throw together into one body all the Protestant Dissenters of the country—for in that manner it would be necessary to take the enumeration—would place those denominations in a position, in comparison with the Established Church, which would not prove disadvantageous to them in a numerical point of view. I think they would have had no reason to fear the result of such an exhibition of their strength as would have been afforded by the plan to which they have offered so much opposition. But I must admit that I thought this proposal would not fail to be generally acceptable to persons of all persuasions. Let me just call attention to the manner in which it has been received, as far as I am aware, in England. The members of the Established Church have either made no objection or are rather favourable to it than otherwise. [Mr. BAINES : No !] A few petitions have, I believe, been presented from members of the Established Church of England, and I am not aware that either they or the heads of the Church have made any remonstrance against the proposal. My hon. Friend said he had heard members of the Established Church object strongly to it, but he did not mention whether they were members of the Church who sat in this House or out of it, because I think it would practically make a good deal of difference whether such persons spoke under the influence exercised over their minds by those whom they represented, or merely gave opinions based on their own individual judgment. I believe, then, I am justified in saying that, as far as publicity goes, there is no serious opposition to this plan on the part of members of the Established Church in England. Nor, again, am I aware that the Roman Catholics have made any special objection to it. The Roman Catholics of England, it is true, are not a very numerous body, but they are quite capable of making themselves heard in this House. I am, however, quite ready to admit that the Nonconformists of this country, of whom I wish to speak with all possible respect on account of the strong religious feelings by which they are animated, and their perfect sincerity on all religious questions, have manifested a very strong and very general opposition to this census. I will advert presently to some of their objections. In Scotland, I believe, there has not been so much interest or feeling excited as in this country; yet there the body who dissent from the Established Church have been, upon the whole, hostile to this plan. My hon. Friend is under some mistake as to the Irish Bill. It does not contain any specific directions as to the particulars to be included in the Returns made; but I think it was intended to comprise religious profession among the subjects of inquiry, and that this was made known publicly in Ireland. Well, I am told that no objection, but rather the contrary, has been expressed in Ireland to a religious census which will include all religious persuasions, and that the Established Church, the Roman Catholic body, and the Presbyterians are all satisfied that such an enumeration should take place. Therefore, when my hon. Friend speaks of the universality of public opinion on this subject, he must allow me to make the not inconsiderable deduction of the public opinion of Ireland, where the great bulk of the population is dissident from the Established Church. Under the circumstances, I confess I was surprised at the reception given to an alteration which seemed to me fitted to remove what I could not but look upon as an unfounded objection to a reasonable proposal.

The first objection I heard urged was that it was an infraction of religious liberty to question a man with regard to his religious profession under threat of a penalty. When this was communicated to me I stated that I should be prepared in Committee to make an exception of the penalty as applicable to the question respecting a man's religious persuasion, thereby obviating the alleged infraction of religious liberty. Still, that concession did not at all mitigate the opposition which existed. It appears from the authentic explanation of my hon. Friend that there is no wish on the part of the Nonconformists of this country to conceal their religion; he says they are ready to proclaim it, but that their feeling is not to state it in answer to any authoritative demand. [Mr. BAINES: Hear!] Well, but if you remove the penalty, surely it is not an "authoritative demand" in any other sense than that it is made by the persons employed and authorized by the Government. When a man has the full power of giving or refusing an answer as he thinks fit, how can the inquiry put to him come within my hon. Friend's category of "authoritative demands?" But there is a singular inconsistency on the part of those by whom this objection is urged. Great numbers of congregations approach this House describing themselves either generally as Protestant Dissenters or in some cases mentioning the particular denomination to which they respectively belong; and yet these very persons protest in the same petitions against being called upon to state that they are Protestant Dissenters, or what is their religious persuasion! How is one to understand the state of feeling of individuals who actually come before this House and publicly proclaim their religious profession, and nevertheless tell us in the same document they have insuperable objections to declaring it when they are asked to enter it in a column of the paper left with them by an enumerator? I will give the Committee some examples of that to which I refer. I hold in my hand a petition presented only to-day by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds. It is "the humble petition of the undersigned members of the congregation of Free Church Methodists in the town of Burton-upon-Trent, in the county of Stafford," and is against "the religious persuasion clause," as it is called. These people call themselves "Free Church Methodists." Why should they object to inserting in a census paper the description which they thus give themselves? The great majority of these petitions are in the same form. I have before me the last Report of the Select Committee on Public Petitions. At page 1,487 I find under the head "against statement of 'religious profession,'" the following:—"The minister and representatives of the denomination of Nonconformist churches called General Baptists assembled at their annual association held at Wisbech, in the county of Cambridge," the name of the chairman of the meeting being given. Again, another petition is from a meeting of the "General Assembly of General Baptist Churches in England and Wales, held in Worship Street, London;" another is from the "Western Unitarian Christian Union of Wilts, Dorset," &c.; another from the "Minister and Deacons of the Independent Chapel, Tavistock;" another from the "Annual Meeting of the Bible Christians of the Shebbear district, held at Barnstaple;" another from the "London Second Circuit of Primitive Methodists;" and so on through about a page and a-half of this Report, where the petitioners sometimes describe themselves as Protestant Dissenters merely, and sometimes refer themselves to some particular shade of Protestant dissent. Yet these are the persons who come before this House with the specific prayer that they may not be called upon to state that they are Nonconformists. I confess I am greatly at a loss to understand the nature of their objection.

Sir George Lewis

My hon. Friend says they have "an instinctive feeling" on this subject. That was his expression in describing the sentiments of the bodies whom he represents; they do not wish to conceal their religious profession, but they nevertheless have "an instinctive feeling" and "a conscientious scruple" against being called on to mention it for the purpose of the Census. If instinctive feelings or conscientious scruples of this kind are entertained, all one can say is that, while it is proper to respect them, it is useless to attempt to reason against them. The House will recollect the important consequences which were produced by the conscientious scruple of a

King of this country on the subject of the Coronation Oath, as affecting the emancipation of the Roman Catholics. That unhappy conscientious scruple was the cause that prevented the settlement of this great question in the year 1801, when it was proposed by Mr. Pitt. At the outset George III. appealed to his conscientious scruples, founded on the oath he had taken. He said, "It is impossible for me to listen to argument on the matter. I have an instinctive feeling which tells me that it is wrong in me to emancipate the Roman Catholics." And, accordingly, the resistance which the King then made led to the downfall of the powerful Government of Mr. Pitt, the important question of the Catholic claims remaining open until the year 1829. Therefore, I quite feel that these scruples which I have no doubt generally exist among the Nonconformist body must be respected, but that it is vain, by any arguments I can use at present, to attempt to mitigate their strength.

The taking of the census is a process for the success of which it is necessary to obtain the general and cordial co-operation of the people. We may nominally threaten a penalty, but practically that penalty cannot be enforced; and the only hope of procuring an accurate enumeration of the people either for civil or religious purposes is with their general consent. Now, I have received a report from the Registrar General in which he expresses great alarm as to the effect of any general resistance on the part of the Dissenting bodies to the proposed method of taking the census. He thinks that not only will the religious census necessarily be imperfect if orders are issued from the different centres and governing bodies of the Nonconformist Churches to their members to withhold information—a plan which, I understand, is likely to be adopted, but it is possible that the discontent which would be excited would render the census defective in other particulars; thereby producing evils not limited to the subject immediately under consideration. I hold in my hand a copy of a circular sent out by the London Board of Congregational Ministers, and containing a series of resolutions unanimously adopted at a meeting of ministers held on the 25th ultimo, at the Congregational Library. This document protests against this provision of the Census Bill, among other reasons, "Because they are confident that should this obnoxious requirement be enforced, such numbers of the Nonconforming community will conscientiously decline to supply the information demanded as must necessarily vitiate the entire return." Now the persons who make this prophecy have the power of fulfilling it. Those who predict that a religious census cannot be taken, when it is avowedly one of a merely voluntary character, will have the power of fulfilling their prophecy and impairing its completeness and accuracy. In a matter of this kind it seems to me vain and idle to argue against my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, who is the master of twenty legions. Under these circumstances, seeing that there has been excited among a large portion of the people of this country, and directed against this proposal, a strong religious sentiment, the sincerity or depth of which it would be impossible to question, although I must be permitted to think it rests altogether upon illusory grounds, I am not prepared to insist on this part of the Bill now before the Committee. At the same time I trust that the reasons I have stated will be weighed by the members of the Nonconformist body, and that having obtained their wishes on this occasion they may be inclined on some future census to mitigate their hostility to a religious enumeration, and to consider, not upon the grounds of instinct or of mere sentiment, but upon more argumentative and rational grounds, the substance of their objections to it. This is not the only country in which the proposal of a census has been met by an unreasoning objection. [Cries of "No, no!" on the Ministerial side, followed by Opposition cheers.] Well, I withdraw the word "unreasoning," and call it an objection based upon feeling and sentiment. It is well known as a matter of history that the passage of Scripture referring to the census ordered by King David was once very generally regarded as indicating the general impiety of such an enumeration, and I am not sure that the taking of even a general census of the population in many countries of Europe was not delayed for centuries on that account. In other parts of the world there have also been objections to a complete enumeration of the people. In most Mahomedan States there has been an overwhelming repugnance to furnishing information regarding one-half of the population—namely, the women. It has been viewed as a terrible affront to inquire of the Mussulman and some other Oriental nations what was the entire number of the inmates of a house. I find this passage in the work of that celebrated traveller in the East, Volney, published towards the close of the last century :—

“ All the calculations of population in Turkey are arbitrary, because there are no registers of births, deaths, or marriages. The Mussulmans have even superstitious prejudices against the taking of a census. The Christians alone can be enumerated by means of their capitation tickets.”

I inquired of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes), who has devoted much attention to statistical subjects, whether the known objection of the Mussulmans to a census which includes women, had prevented the British Government in India from making a complete enumeration of the population. The hon. and gallant Member told me that he had himself superintended a census of the Deccan; that it comprised females as well as males; that the head of each house made his return, and that this objection had been overcome. That example shows that where an aversion to a particular item of the census exists in any population it may gradually be overcome, and that the progress of inquiry and the increase of intelligence may lead to the removal of prejudices which, at a given moment, are invincible. I think the time will come when the objections which have been so fully stated by my hon. Friend to a religious census will be found to rest rather upon imagination than upon reality. But it is impossible to deny that at present they do weigh with a large section of the people, and that, influencing as they do their judgments and feelings, it is now impossible to carry a religious census into effect with a reasonable prospect of success. Upon that ground, Sir, I acquiesce in the Amendment now before the Committee.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Whatever varying opinions may float through the Committee, I think that as to the remarkable speech which has just been delivered hon. Gentlemen on both sides will be inclined to admit that the right hon. Baronet has been thoroughly impartial. The sentiments he has uttered, as far as I can gather, have somehow or other contrived to irritate and reflect upon every party in this House. [“ No, no,” from the Opposition.] What! are hon. Gentlemen on the other side then quite satisfied with the right hon. Baronet’s impotent conclusion? Why, the right hon. Gentleman, before drawing his extraordinary parallel between the Mussulmans of the East and the Dissenters of England, talked of the singular inconsistency of the great body of Nonconformists in this country. I ask any sensible man in this House whether it is true that where sentiment and feeling exist it is impossible there can be reason? Was there ever a speech so full of singular inconsistency as that of the right hon. Gentleman? After supplying the best arguments he could find, and displaying his great research, he told the opponents of his plan that they are such—he did not say “ brutes”—but such “ Mussulmans” that he hopes they will become more rational in future, and not resist his wise and sensible provision. Meantime, however, says the right hon. Baronet, as you are the masters of twenty legions, and command so many votes, I withdraw my obnoxious proposition. I am very sorry that the right hon. Gentleman has withdrawn the proposition, and given such excellent reasons for retaining it. There was one part of his speech, however, in which he showed more sentiment and feeling than reason. He expressed a wish, why I do not know, to assimilate this country to the continental system. Why, in the world, he should go to the Continent for his example I am at a loss to imagine. He adduced the instances of France and Prussia. Now, we all know that in France the State subsidizes all forms of religion. In Prussia, I believe, it subsidizes but two—Roman Catholics and Protestants; and for this reason, that all who are not Roman Catholics are classed as Protestants, and it is supposed that there are no Dissenters. But what analogy is there between Prussia or France and this country? If the Government of this country subsidized all forms of religion, it would have a right to put this question; but it does not, and a great proportion of the people repudiate its jurisdiction in spiritual matters. Therefore, I say, that it has no right to ask this question. The right hon. Gentleman referred to Spain, but he forgot to inform the Committee that, in that country, it is penal for any one to be a Protestant, and that within the last few days he has received a petition from a Protestant complaining that he was included among the Roman Catholics. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of civilized countries, and seemed to draw a distinction between civilized and constitutional countries. Why did he not go to America, where the manners, institutions, and customs of the people are more congenial with those of England than elsewhere, and tell the House how they take the Census there? In the last report upon the American Census it is stated:—

Sir George Lewis

“In a previous publication we returned the churches, but without the extent of accommodation or the value of church property, which were not included in the tables, on the ground that it was not probable that they were places exclusively set apart for religious worship. If the object extended no further than the mere ascertainment of churches, the value of the property, &c., there could be little objection to it, but as it is evident that conclusions will be drawn from the results favourable or adverse to the character of the various communities—a matter justly more important than a mere question of bricks and mortar—it cannot be considered a sound one, and ought to have been, as it has been, reversed.”

Therefore, it appears that, so far from our brethren in America taking the Census as it is taken in Prussia and France, they take it as was done in the year 1851 in this country. [“No, no.”] Not the present census, because they have even altered that. They stand upon the broad ground that no man has a right to inquire the religious opinion of another—the ground on which I resist this most mischievous proposition of the Government. I will not condescend to narrow the question by going into figures. I say that the Government has no right to inquire as to the religious persuasion of any member of the community. The right hon. Baronet entered into a very minute criticism of the Report of Mr. Horace Mann, and endeavoured to discredit the Census of 1851. I was very much surprised to hear him take that course, because the Home Secretary in 1854, the noble Lord now at the head of the Government, when questioned by Mr. Apsley Pellatt upon the subject, said, “I entertain no doubt as to the accuracy of the Returns with regard to all the facts to which they refer, I repose entire confidence on the accuracy of these Returns.” Now, forsooth, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary of 1860 gets up and says that these Returns are not to be relied upon.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I did not at all dispute the numerical accuracy of the Returns. What I disputed was the accuracy of the method.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: So far I am glad to hear that the right hon. Baronet does not now dispute the accuracy of the Returns, but if he does not dispute the accuracy of the Returns of 1851, why is he not satisfied with the system? Why does he give those reasons of sentiment and feeling, instead of arguing the point, which I do not think he has done? He has forgotten that several local inquiries were made into these Returns of the year 1851. The Bishop of Oxford impugned their accuracy, but, after inquiry, he stated in his charge to his clergy in the year 1854, that he was perfectly satisfied of the accuracy of the census so far as his diocese was concerned. Therefore I am surprised that—not here, but in reply to deputations attending in Downing Street—the accuracy of these Returns has been impugned. I believe that an inquiry is now being made into the subject by the National Society, and that every day the accuracy of these Returns is confirmed. This very morning a very long letter has appeared from Mr. Horace Mann, in which he affirms that the accusations have been carelessly made, and goes so far as to say that they are ludicrously false. I do not go so far as that, because I am satisfied that no hon. Gentleman would make accusations which he did not think he could prove, at least, in this House. But I do not think the accusations ever have been proved in this House. I think that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was carelessly made, and that the conclusion at which he arrived is not what it ought to have been, considering the tenor of that speech. As far as this proposition is concerned, I object to it on two grounds. In the first place, I object to it as an infringement of religious liberty, because the State has no right to ask the religious opinions of men whom it does not pay or assist in any manner, and who repudiate its spiritual jurisdiction; and, secondly, I think that the statistical facts proposed to be ascertained will prove mere fiction. The noble Lord at the head of the Government stated to a deputation which waited upon him at the Home Office lately, that the only wish of the Government was to ascertain facts which would be important as the foundation of legislative action. That was stated to a deputation from hon. Members opposite, who tendered their allegiance to the noble Lord opposite on condition that this religious profession clause was adhered to, and among that deputation was the real master of twenty legions. On that occasion the noble Lord gave an implied pledge that he would not give up the clause. I believe he said he would stick to it. That does not always mean that a Prime Minister will stick to it; but, at all events, he said that he wished to ascertain facts which would be important as the foundation of legislative action. I say that is impossible to ascertain facts, and that you would only get a great blue-book, containing, not facts, but fictions, under the semblance of Parliamentary authority. For these reasons, and because I think it both unwise and unworthy of any Government to get up sectarian differences among the population of England, which would be the effect of this clause, I heartily oppose it.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the Committee ought to have some assurance from the right hon. Gentleman after the announcement he had made of his willingness to omit the words "religious profession" from the Bill that the Government would not use the powers given to them by the Bill so as to carry out any inquiry such as that which was made in 1851.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that there were in the Act under which the Census of 1851 was taken some general words enabling the Secretary of State to add particulars, under the authority of which the inquiries as to places of worship and places of education were made. Those words were omitted from this Bill, and therefore the Secretary of State would have no power to direct inquiries to be made as to any particulars which were not included in the Act.

MR. HENLEY said, he was glad to hear that statement, but he was afraid that the words were still large enough to enable the Secretary of State, either by the form of the schedule or by directions to the enumerators, to include matters of this kind. He should not have been so anxious upon this subject had it not been for the speech of the hon. Member for Leeds, who had dug up a buried controversy, had attempted to defend what no one had accused, and had, with the force of twenty legions, urged the Government to repeat what the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had properly described as accurate in itself, but faulty in its method, and likely to lead to erroneous conclusions. He was still more rejoiced that the Committee had received a public pledge that the Government did not intend to repeat the inquiry of 1851, because the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne), after reading from an American document a passage condemning even the enumeration of buildings, had followed it up by insinuating that it would be very desirable to repeat the proceeding of ten years ago. With regard to the mode of taking the census, all that he had heard from members of the Church of England was that if there was to be a religious census at all, this was the proper mode of taking it; that they were perfectly satisfied the Church would come well out of it, but that they were sure that the Dissenters would not consent to it; that the apples would not be numbered, that the proposal would raise a frightful storm, and they wondered how Government could have been so foolish as to put such a proposition in the Bill. The hope that had been expressed, that the Nonconformists would, within the next ten years, become as sensible as Mahomedans was a sort of consolation which would, no doubt, cause the sugarplum which they had just received to be swallowed with much additional zest and satisfaction. As it took some thirty years to remove the conscientious scruples of the Sovereign in 1801, he supposed that it would be at least the same period before the Nonconformists of this country became, in regard to this subject, as intelligent as Hindoos and Mahomedans. For his own part, he had never been able to understand their scruples. Probably if he was a Nonconformist he might, but as he did not happen to have that privilege, he could not understand what difference it could make to a religious body to have it ascertained whether its members were ten or ten thousand in number. There seemed, however, to be an objection to the ascertainment of such facts, and he thought that the Government had good reason for giving way upon this point. The hon. Member for Liskeard was in error in stating that the National Society was making an inquiry to test the accuracy of Mr. Horace Mann's religious census. The statistics which that society was collecting were similar to those which it had collected ever since its foundation; they referred to education, and had nothing to do either with Mr. Horace Mann's figures or with this religious question. All that he hoped was that, now Government had shown such extreme deference to what they called instinctive feeling and conscientious scruples, they would upon educational questions show an equal respect for the conscientious feelings of great bodies of the people. Had the Government adhered to this clause, he should have been glad to have supported it, but as they had given way, he should not oppose its withdrawal.

Mr. Bernal Osborne

MR. MARSH said, that religious censuses had been taken in Australia without any objection from the people, but they were as uncertain and as unsatisfactory as they could possibly be. On the last occasion on which such an inquiry was made he had about 300 people in his employment. He never asked them what their religion was, but put down all the Irish as Catholics, all the English as belonging to the Church of England, and all the Scotch as Presbyterians. That was almost the universal rule, except that some persons followed the example of a friend of his, who, having eighty-six servants, lumped them and put all down as belonging to the Church of England. In the Colonies there was, however, a reason for a census of this sort which did not exist in this country. There a certain sum of money was reserved to be divided among all religious denominations, and it was therefore important to ascertain how many members there were belonging to each sect. In England no such reason existed, and therefore an inquiry as to the religious professions of the people was mere idle curiosity, and its results would prove of no practical value or serve any other purpose than to enable some statistical member of the British Association to draw an erroneous conclusion as to the relative numbers of the different denominations. It was remarkable that there were a good many questions to be considered at the statistical congress in the ensuing week, but religious persuasion was not among them. When statistics attempted to deal with things which were not positive and certain, they were almost sure to go wrong. Illustrations of this were to be found in the statement as to the education of prisoners in the gaol calendars and in the weekly statement of the value of goods exported from this country. Prisoners concealed their knowledge in order that their sentences might be mitigated; and in one case he had a servant who had been transported, and who during seven years' professed to be unable to read or write, but directly his sentence had expired proved to him that he could read as well and write better than he could. It was very wise of the Government to withdraw the obnoxious portion of this clause. There ought to be a delicacy in asking as to a man's religious opinions, and men ought to act in harmony with the speech of the Irish gentleman in the time of the Prince Regent, who, being asked to what religion he belonged, replied, "In such excellent society as the present I am of no particular persuasion, but when I am at home I am of the old faith." Instead of trying to expose religious differences, they ought to endeavour to conceal them.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he did not think that the right hon. Baronet could well have come to any other decision than that at which he had arrived. The Church of England had no reason to regret the course which he had adopted. The victory of instinctive feeling which they had witnessed that day would for ever dispose of Mr. Horace Mann and the Census of 1851; and he hoped that they would never again hear those most fallacious Returns, and the still more fallacious inferences which had been drawn from them, cited in debate. There was a good deal to be said against a census having reference to religious opinions. He did not know what business the State had with the matter; but he wished they had heard a little more of those arguments in the year 1850. When it was proposed to frame the census upon a plan which it was thought might be favourable to the religious body which had the greatest political organization, and could apply the sharpest whip to its members, they heard nothing about the impropriety of examining into religious opinions. Ever since the Census of 1851 was published it had been made the basis of reproaches against the Church of England, and attempts to undermine her position as an Establishment. It was all very well to renounce it now, but it had been appealed to in continual debates with very telling effect. He hoped that after the exposé of that day's debate all that would end. The country would now know that it was Churchmen who wished for facts, and Dissenters who did not. The Dissenters had by their conduct admitted that there was something awkward, something they did not wish to be inquired into, in the Census Returns of 1851. If a trader had kept his books in rather an intricate and unusual manner, and when any one proposed to check them he threw up his hands in virtuous indignation and objected to any examination, they would all know what to believe. If a lady was asked her age and declined to tell it, they would all know what to infer from the denial. And so, too, if they asked the Dissenters their number and they did not like to tell them, they all knew what to believe. It would hardly need any facts to show that the Census of 1851 could not in future be relied upon; but he wished to call the attention of the House to the fact that in many cases the congregations of Dissenting chapels were returned at larger numbers than the buildings would hold. At Bradford the Wesleyan Reformers had a chapel capable of holding 810 persons. The number returned as attending religious worship was 1,061 in the morning and 1,483 in the evening. At Halifax the chapel would hold 400 persons; the numbers returned were 460 in the morning and 526 in the evening. At Leeds the chapel would contain 200; the numbers returned were 650 in the morning, 723 in the afternoon, and 1,030 in the evening. What a crush there must have been! A right rev. Prelate, whose impartiality was well known, and who entertained no strong views upon religious questions, stated in the other House that in his diocese Sunday-school children had been driven from chapel to chapel at various times of the day, and that where two or three denominations had each a chapel they had clubbed their congregations at different services, so that all three might count for each. These were the sort of things which had tainted the Census of 1851 with fraud, and had affixed to it the character which those on his side of the House had always endeavoured to enforce, and which hon. Gentlemen opposite had now stamped indelibly upon it as true. Whatever else might be said, whenever those Returns were appealed to in future, Churchmen would be able to say that they asked to verify them and the Dissenters would not consent.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that the obnoxious portion of the clause had not been withdrawn either courteously or generously, because, although the right hon. Baronet made a speech which was rather that of a philosopher than a statesman, there was in it a great deal of sneering and cynical observation upon the Opposition on the part of religious bodies to this census. The right hon. Gentleman said that there was an instinctive feeling or sentiment against this clause, and he likened it to the instinctive feeling which he said animated George III. to refuse to consent to Catholic emancipation. That was a most unjust and unsound illustration. George III. told Mr. Pitt from an instinctive feeling, that his yacht was ready, and that he was prepared to start for Hanover if emancipation was pressed. He might remind the right hon. Baronet that Horne Tooke wrote that what was called firmness in a king was called obstinacy in a donkey, and he therefore thought that this allusion to the instinctive feeling of George III. was an unjust sneer upon a great body of persons who had from conscientious motives opposed this census.

Lord Robert Cecil

The right hon. Gentleman was "willing to wound but yet afraid to strike." Had the provision been proposed by the Conservative party, those who remained of the effete body of the Whigs would have raised the cry of civil and religious liberty throughout the country, and would have made great capital of it; but being in office the right hon. Baronet and his colleagues endeavoured to pass the matter by with a sneer. The noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil) compared the compulsion to declare religious opinions with the compulsion of a trader to exhibit his books. Why, a trader was responsible to his creditors for all the property which he had received, and was therefore bound to show his books. Again, the noble Lord, as a sort of satire upon the question, said that if a lady was asked her age she would not answer.

LORE ROBERT CECIL explained that he said, that if a lady was asked her age and did not reply, every one knew what to think.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he was told that that was a plagiarism from the noble Lord at the head of the Government, from whom he would not be much surprised to hear such a jaunty sort of expression upon a question of religion, but what had it to do with the question before the House? He was sure that every one would rejoice that this obnoxious clause had been withdrawn; but it appeared to him to have been withdrawn in a manner which was most ungracious to religious bodies who opposed it from an instinctive and natural feeling, upon which the Whigs, if in Opposition, would have traded, but at which, being in office, they sneered.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to protest against the expression which had been current in the debate that the Legislature had nothing to do with religion. That never had been true in this country; neither under the Commonwealth, nor under any form of monarchy. It was entirely untrue to say that the Legislature of England, which had to provide so many things essential for religious worship, had nothing to do with religion. The example of the United States had been referred to; but in the United States there was no Established Church; nor did the present condition of that country invite the imitation of England. It was well known that he had much community of feeling with the Protestant Dissenters; that his sympathy for them were very great, and that he would be no party to anything calculated to injure or reflect on them. He should not have been surprised at the Roman Catholic party objecting to a religious census; but he confessed he was both surprised and pained at seeing the Nonconformist body object in so arbitrary a manner to furnishing the necessary information, which could only be obtained properly by means of the census. However, as the proposal contained in this clause could not be carried out, he was satisfied that the next best thing was now to be done. We were in the Census to have no specific information at all with regard to religious persuasions, but were to rely upon other natural sources of information—the registries of births, marriages, and deaths. He believed that the Returns of 1851 with respect to religion were entirely fallacious, and therefore rejoiced that they had been given up, as they could not be improved in the ensuing Census. An attempt had been made to draw a parallel between the conduct of the Dissenters on that occasion, and that of those who opposed Catholic Emancipation; and reflections had been cast freely upon those, and the memory of those, who opposed that measure. Yet, it had recently been admitted by the leading organ of public opinion, the intelligence and power of which were well known throughout the world, that the proceedings of the opposition to Catholic Emancipation had been too surely justified by the event. The memory of King George III. and of his faithful adviser, Lord Eldon, had been vindicated from the imputation of unreasoning bigotry. Of the sincerity of that Sovereign's convictions no doubt was ever entertained; for it was well-known that he would have abdicated rather than assent to that measure. His political foresight was now respected. He trusted that a better temper would be manifested by the Roman Catholics, and that there would be a revival among them of national feeling, as contradistinguished from a blind submission to the behests of Ultramontanist faction. In conclusion, while he regretted that the Government did not feel themselves strong enough to insist upon the retention of that part of their Bill which related to religion, he tendered them his best thanks for sweeping away the erroneous Returns of 1851.

SIR MORTON PETO said, that if the right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, had possessed, among his other attainments, a knowledge of the history of Nonconformists, he would not have made the speech which he had addressed to the Committee upon the present occasion. The right hon. Gentleman had referred them to the Continent for examples worthy of imitation. He (Sir Morton Peto) had had some experience of the Continent; and in Austria, which had a concordat with Rome, none of his agents were permitted to have a Roman Catholic servant, because they were assumed to be Protestants. It was sometimes assumed in that House that the Roman Catholics alone were persecutors; but on a recent visit to a Protestant State in the North of Europe, he found thirteen persons belonging to the same denomination as himself were imprisoned, and compelled to subsist upon bread and water, simply because they had a decided religious conviction. The accuracy of the Census of 1851 had been impugned; but he believed that any inquiry which might be instituted into that question would result, as previous inquiries had resulted, in showing that the Census of 1851 was substantially correct. Why should Dissenters be compelled to make a religious confession to a Government from which they derived no assistance in religious matters? They had no objection, as far as he was aware, to give the number of their places of worship, the amount of accommodation provided in each, and even the number and description of their schools; and he maintained that it would be unjust to require more of them. He was glad the subject had been debated, though he regretted the spirit in which it had been treated by the right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, by the character of whose remarks he felt, as a Nonconformist, that he had been personally insulted. There was no body more devotedly loyal to the Crown, more anxious for the welfare of their fellow-subjects, or even more ardent in their support of the Government to which the right hon. Gentleman belonged, than the Dissenters of England. It was, therefore, to be deplored that the Home Secretary should have deemed it his duty to pass upon them a gratuitous insult. He would not continue his remarks, inasmuch as Government had thought fit to withdraw the obnoxious part of the clause; but he thought that Churchmen and Dissenters had a higher duty than quarrelling as to their relative numbers; and that when inquiry was made in the country as to the various places of worship, they would find that over and beyond all there was a large outlying population, who were neither Churchmen nor Dissenters; and instead of Churchmen and Dissenters quarrelling as to which was the most important body, let them coalesce to bring back these wandering sheep to the fold of Christ, and in a Christian feeling, laying aside all spirit of antagonism, let them act together for the benefit of the entire community.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, he could not compliment the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary upon the good grace with which he had yielded to the pressure to abandon the proposal. Indeed, he could not help saying that he had done a right thing with a bad grace. He had withdrawn an objectionable proposition, but he had also clearly intimated that nothing but the force of numbers could have induced him to give way. Yet there were very strong and cogent reasons why Dissenters should refuse their assent to a religious census. The Government had no right to inquire into a man's religious profession, and if they had a right to demand what his faith was, they might claim an equal right to know how he observed its teachings. In reference to the remarks of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Cecil), he wished to point out that in many chapels numbers of persons were compelled to stand during the whole service, and were crowded in the building just as hon. Members were crowded in that House during an important debate; and just as the House, with sittings for only about 200 had 650 Members, so several chapels held a far greater number than the regular seat accommodation could provide for. He thought it very desirable that the numbers belonging to each denomination should be known, and suggested that either the principle of 1851 should be adopted, or that the number of places of worship and the numbers of seats should be ascertained, so as to obtain an approximation to the results.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he believed it could be shown that if people were compelled to make a public confession of their religious opinions, the result would be in some cases to inflict upon them great hardships in a social, and even in a legal point of view. Some years ago a man in the West of England was sent to prison for a period of one year and nine months for having written some words upon a gateway expressive of his religious convictions. Subsequently, upon the attention of the Home Secretary being called to the case, the punishment was remitted; but still the fact remained that the public statement of opinions which might be thought heterodox in some particulars might expose even a well-meaning man to heavy pains and penalties. Again, if a man were to describe himself, in compliance with an Act of Parliament, as of no religious opinion whatever, would he not disqualify himself from giving evidence in a court of justice? The Americans contented themselves with obtaining an account of the churches and other places of worship belonging to all religious denominations, and the number of persons they were capable of accommodating. Similar facts might be gathered in this country from the authorized publications of the different Dissenting communities, and he thought the Home Secretary would do well to have them compiled for the information of the public generally.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he rose for the purpose of expressing a hope that, notwithstanding the over-learned, but perhaps not over-lively, speech of his right hon. Friend (Sir George Lewis) the great Dissenting bodies would rightly understand the spirit in which these words were proposed and the spirit in which they were withdrawn. He trusted that it would be understood by every body of persons in the country that the words were inserted because it was thought that the results of the provision they introduced would prove exceedingly useful to the legislation of the country, and that its withdrawal was due to a becoming deference to a strong expression of opinion on the part of Dissenters. When the whole of the grants for education which were annually voted by Parliament depended upon the fact of there being large Dissenting bodies who proclaimed themselves as such, and as such desired and received Government aid, it could not be said that an accurate account of the numerical strength of each denomination would be an entirely worthless document. He could not sympathize with the feeling that induced a man to decline to state his religious profession, because he believed England to be the most religious country in the world, and religious profession was perfectly consistent with the spirit of this country. Allusion had been made to the time when religious opinion carried with it civil disability, but even in the worst times of persecution the English people boldly avowed their religious opinions, and it was a proof rather of a decline than of an advance of religious sentiment that there should be an indisposition on the part of any considerable body to make the same declaration. At the same time he thought that in the face of the opposition which existed Government had done wisely in withdrawing the clause.

Sir Morton Peto

MR. MONSELL said, he sincerely hoped the Government would not pursue the same course in regard to Ireland as they proposed to adopt in regard to England. In Ireland no difficulty whatever would exist in obtaining a religious census. Every one had a religion of some kind, and no one was ashamed to avow it. It was absurd to say that they could ever arrive at any conclusion worth having, unless they took a correct religious census of the people, and he hoped the Government would insert a clause in the Irish Census Act, not only authorising, but directing the Lord Lieutenant to take steps for the purpose. The real meaning of the opposition in England, besides the conscientious conviction, lay in the idea that the floating masses of the people, of no particular religious persuasion, would, if there was a religious census taken, be all put down to the Established Church.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was happy to say that the announcement made by the Government of their intention to discontinue the prohibition against the taking of a religious census in Ireland had not excited the smallest opposition in that country. On the contrary, so far as his information went, it was the universal desire that such a census should be taken. The Government intended, therefore, to take it, and when the Irish Bill came to be discussed in Committee he should consider the propriety of introducing words to that effect.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Before I touch upon the question immediately before the Committee, I cannot refrain from congratulating hon. Gentlemen opposite on the additional proof we have this day received of the unanimity and subordination to their chief which prevail among the occupants of the Treasury bench. A few days since we heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer turning into open ridicule the statements and intentions of the Prime Minister; while at the commencement of our proceedings to-day the Secretary of State for India presented a petition, couched in the strongest language, against the proposed religious census, adding, in defiance of our rules, an emphatic declaration to the effect that he cordially concurred in that condemnation. That is to say, the right

hon. Gentleman cordially concurred in condemning a proposition brought forward by Her Majesty's Government, to which he, therefore, was a party, which the noble Viscount the Prime Minister, in answer to a deputation, has openly approved, and which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has to-day advocated in clear and forcible terms. One of the public journals has described a recent speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a "frantic indecorum;" I am not sure that the escapade of the Minister for India should not be included in the same category. With respect to the omission of these words in the Bill, I must express my deep regret that we are not to have any census of religion. This I regard as a great misfortune much to be deplored, and I cannot help thinking that the Protestant Dissenters of this country and their representatives in this House will be sorry for the course they have taken on this subject. I am free to use this language, because I am not aware that I ever said anything approaching to disrespect of my Dissenting fellow-citizens; on the contrary, I have again and again expressed my sincere convictions that we, Christians of the Church of England, are deeply indebted to our Dissenting brethren for the manner in which they have filled up that vacancy which exists in the means and administration of the Church of England, and, therefore, I never hear a discussion like this without regretting that we Protestant Christians do not think more of the substance of our Christianity, and less of forms. Upon this subject I have watched the proceedings of the Dissenters with astonishment. I came down to the House to hear some satisfactory reason given for the course they have pursued, and I listened with attention to the speech of the hon. Member for Leeds; but that hon. Member said nothing which I could qualify as being like a reason. I concur entirely with what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary on this subject; and it seems to me that the Protestant Dissenters are now trying to stop a purpose of great public importance without being able to assign anything like a fair reason for their conduct. Therefore, I am bound to express my belief that they are actuated by what I cannot call by any higher expression than a matter of prejudice. A friend of mine put into my hand a letter from one of his constituents, in which the writer declares that "when a Government official asks me my religious profession, he is guilty not only of impertinence but of insult." How are we to account for such extravagant ideas? We have been told to-day that the Roman Catholics have no objection to make a declaration of their religion; but, on the contrary, desire to do so. We of the Church of England—no small body numerically in this country—likewise have no objection to make such a declaration. If any man were to come to me officially, and were to ask me my religious profession, I should have no more hesitation in saying that I was a member of the Church of England than I should have to acknowledge that I was a Member of this House. I can see no insult or offence in the question, and can feel none. I can only account for the part which the Protestant Dissenters take in one way, and that is by believing that they are afraid of the results of the examination. I can see no other rational mode of accounting for the unreasonable outcry they have raised than by supposing that they are afraid of being found numerically not so strong as they claim to be, or as they were made to appear by the last census. When I say this, let me distinctly state that if any charges of unfairness are made in respect to the mode of taking the religious part of the last census, I do not participate in them; but I concur in the statements made as to the defective method then adopted, and am glad to hear that the Government have no intention to repeat it. I believe the results were, however unintentionally, unfair towards the Church of England, and the hon. Member for Leeds has to-day given a proof of this. The hon. Member spoke of 14,000 places of worship connected with the Established Church, and 20,000 places of worship connected with the Dissenters; but my belief is that the number of 14,000 places of worship, as being the amount connected with the Established Church, is a very great understatement. I speak from memory, but I believe that there are in England and Wales some 11,000 or 12,000 parishes ["More, more!"] and that in consequence of the divisions and districts the number of benefices in connection with the Church of England is not less than between 18,000 and 19,000. Therefore, if the last census only gave the result of 14,000 places of worship, that was a manifest understatement and injustice to the Church of England. A census for religious or any other purposes should be accurate and reliable, but the last census was not so. I very much wish that the religious statistics of the country could be ascertained, and the Protestant Dissenting body have incurred serious responsibility by the unreasonable determination they have come to that this useful information shall not be communicated to Parliament. Then comes the question whether, entertaining these views, I shall be disposed to divide the House for the purpose of maintaining the words in the clause. I think it would be very injudicious to do so. If I find fault with the Government at all, it is not so much for withdrawing the words in question as, in the first instance, for withdrawing the penalty. I do not say that, with the powerful opposition from the Dissenting body, they could have proceeded with the penalty; but when the penalty is withdrawn it becomes a matter of option to state the religious profession, and therefore no reliance could be placed on a return so made, especially after the opposition manifested against it. I am not disposed to blame the Government for the course they have taken to-day. I rather thank them for the intention they entertained to give this information; but I think the responsibility must rest with the Protestant Dissenting body, who have taken their course with such vehemence and unanimity. Though we might charge the noble Lord at the head of the Government with using language on a former occasion inconsistent with the course taken by the Government to-day, I am not disposed to do so, and am not surprised that the noble Lord should regard the opposition now manifested as constituting a change of circumstances, and a reason for a change of conduct.

Sir John Pakington

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has been very unjustly accused of attempting to cast some insult on the Nonconforming body; for it is only by a perversion of the meaning of an argumentative illustration he has used that such a charge could be supported. I entirely concur with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and with the Member for Leeds in thinking that there is value and utility in a religious census. I mention the hon. Member for Leeds, because in the latter part of his speech, he elaborately and successfully showed the utility in embracing in statistical information the gradual progress of religion. I entirely concurred with my right hon. Friend as to the expediency of putting into the Census a religious enumeration; and it never occurred to my mind that it was an inquiry which any person, whatever might be his religious opinions, could reasonably object to. I quite deny that it was to be an inquiry into the shades and grounds and character of every person's religious opinion; for inquiring of each individual to what denomination he belongs would be only like asking in what denomination he was christened; in which he was brought up; if married, where he was married, and where he intended to be buried. These are questions of fact; and it was not intended to ask as to the intensity or shade of a person's belief, but simply to record the fact to what denomination of Christians he and those belonging to him professed to be attached. My right hon. Friend has shown that there is nothing in the question which was proposed to be asked by this clause that need cause any man to refuse an answer, and he stated, in illustration of that opinion, that numerous petitions have been presented, which an immense number of persons have signed, describing themselves as belonging to some one denomination or other of the Christian Church. Therefore, I concur in thinking that there is not a shadow of reason in the objections taken to calling upon persons to record their religious profession. I differ from the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) in his opinion that the intention which we have announced to take away the penalty for not answering the religious question, at all strengthens the case of those who object to the declaration of religious profession. It did appear to me that there was a fair objection to the penalty, and I certainly should have imagined that when the penalty was taken out of the Bill, and the declaration was left optional, every ground of objection on the part of the Nonconforming body had been entirely removed. The question then was put on the Dissenters' own ground—that of the voluntary principle, and I should not have conceived that they would have the slightest cause to object to such an arrangement. I have said that I concurred with the hon. Member for Leeds in thinking that there is value in a periodical enumeration of the different sections of the Christian Church, but I do not agree with him as to the mode of obtaining the information, because nothing could be more entirely fallacious than the mode adopted in 1851. You may say, perhaps some valuable information may be given by the enumeration of the different buildings devoted to Divine worship by different denominations. That may be an enumeration of considerable importance, and may be obtained, I believe, through the medium of the registration; but to ask, as was done in 1851, how many people attended on a given Sunday in different places of worship would procure no information from which any useful conclusion could be drawn. You might get an enumeration of how many people attended Divine worship in the morning, afternoon, and evening; but how do you know that they were not the same individuals who attended these several services in some places, and entirely different congregations at each service in others? No inference of value could be drawn from such information, and therefore I entirely protest against adopting such a mode, attended with trouble and leading to no reasonable conclusion. I concur with the right hon. Baronet in regretting extremely that this objection has been so strongly taken up by the Nonconforming body; and it is impossible to deny that their opposition lays them open to suspicions, as to the motives which have given rise to it. With respect to the enumeration of 1851, I do not believe that there was any fraud practised, but I cannot but think that there is no truth whatever in the conclusions which have been drawn from it. I did not expect there would be so strong an opposition on the part of the Nonconformists to the proposition of the Government, but, at the same time, I quite concur with my right hon. Friend that the opinions and feelings of so large, so highly respectable, and valuable a body of men, placed as they have been on a religious principle, are entitled to respect, and therefore the Government would, I think, be much to blame if they persisted in calling on the Committee to retain in the Bill words to which such strong objection has been taken. Nevertheless, with all respect to the Nonconforming body, I still entertain the opinion that their objections—however founded, in their own mind, on religious principle—are not borne out by any reasons that will bear the test of argument. We defer to their feelings, but we cannot assent to their reasoning.

MR. WHITESIDE said, the noble Lord, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, had given excellent reasons for pursuing the course they had abandoned. He had been charmed with the language and argument of the Home Secretary. How convincing were the facts, and how well arranged the matter! But, after being convinced by the right hon. Gentleman, he was disappointed to hear that the right hon. Gentleman was about to withdraw a proposition so satisfactorily supported. It appeared from the statement of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, that the Dissenters had not a shadow of reason for the course they had taken; and yet they were to succeed in their object; so it might be concluded that when they had good reason on their side they would fail. At present, however, whether the Dissenters were right or wrong, it appeared that they were too powerful for the Ministry to withstand, and were enabled to dictate their own terms to the Government. It was said by the hon. Member for Leeds that it was decreed that the Church of Christ was not to be subject to the Government. [Mr. BAINES: In matters of religion.] He had always understood it to be the duty of the Christian Church to be subject to the State: such, at all events, was the interpretation which he drew from the Sacred Writings. It must not be supposed that the Church of this country objected to a proper religious census. He had been applied to by a clergyman in Staffordshire to press for such a census; for this clergyman stated that, at the last census, his parishioners, being much engaged at the time in the glass-works, absented themselves, in consequence of their unwashed condition, from the church on the day of the taking of the Census; so that they were not put down in the account. Yet, if they were asked how they would be enrolled, they would reply, and truly, that they were members of the Church of England. When the Church-rate question was under discussion, the Church of England had been described as a sect; but no one would be persuaded that that was true, when he stated that 80 per cent of the women of England were married in the Church. That was a great fact; for, with that part of the population on the side of the Church, the other part would be sure to be brought round. He saw, also, among the papers he had occasion to examine that 78 per cent of the children at school, were in schools of the Church of England. That was a good fact; and another fact was, that the Dissenters were afraid of a religious census. When, therefore, he was told of the number of the chapels of the Dissenters, and the Church of England was being turned into a sect, it was his firm determination, with all respect to the person who made the statement, not to believe a word of it. Why should he not say, "I am Protestant, and belong to the Church of England?" He had said so all his life; and yet the Dissenters, when they came into this House, and were asked to say that they were the same men out of it as in it, complained of the question as being an offence. With respect to Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary for Ireland, had risen with alacrity to inform the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell), that the words "religious profession," which had been struck out of the English Bill, should be introduced into the Irish Bill. Now, it should be recollected that those words were not at present in the Bill for Ireland. Why, then, did the right hon. Gentleman evince so great an eagerness to place Ireland on a different footing to that of England in respect to the Census? He believed the people of Ireland to be less than 6,000,000 at that moment. He also thought that the Roman Catholics were sincere in their desire to have their religious profession enumerated in the Census Bill. The Presbyterian body he believed to be equally anxious for that course. The Episcopalians were not ashamed to rank among the members of the Church of England. Nevertheless, he objected most strongly to the principle of legislating for a common empire upon different principles. They were willing to have one common census for England and Ireland. He should, therefore, claim for himself the right of objecting to any measure for Ireland framed upon a different principle to that for England.

Mr. Whiteside

MR. CARDWELL said, he wished to explain. The Irish Act of 1850 adopted a different mode of taking the Census, inasmuch as the Government of that day availed itself of the assistance of the constabulary in the collection of that Census, and the Return for Ireland was more complete than that for England. In the Act of the present year the Government had followed verbatim the law of 1850, except so far as omitting the prohibition of taking the religious census. When he gave notice of the Bill he stated, however, to the House that it was his intention by that measure to take a religious census.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it was stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell), that nobody in Ireland objected to the religious census. He wished, therefore, to ask the hon. Member for Leeds whether there were any Protestant dissenters in Ireland, and if there were, why they did not share the conscientious scruples of their co-religionists in this country with respect to the religious provision of the Census Bill?

MR. DAWSON intimated that a Report had been presented to the General Assembly in Ireland that a deputation had waited upon the Chief Secretary in Ireland for the purpose of expressing their desire for a census to be made of the religious denominations in the country.

MR. BAINES said, he would appeal to the Committee whether he had allowed a word to drop from him that could have conveyed the slightest offence to any hon. Member of that House. He studiously avoided saying anything that could wound the feelings of any Gentleman. He wished he could say that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department had been as inoffensive to the Dissenters as his (Mr. Baines') arguments were towards the members of the Church. That speech of the right hon. Gentleman was, in his opinion, contemptuous and discourteous towards the Dissenting body, describing them as it did as being deficient in the faculty of reason. When the right hon. Gentleman was conscious that that body constituted 5,000,000 of the population of England and Wales, and formed the great strength of his own party, he (Mr. Baines) did not think that that was the language which the right hon. Gentleman should have used towards them. In reply to the question of the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners), which was one that would better have been addressed to an hon. Member for the sister country, his information only enabled him to say that there was a considerable body of Wesleyans in Ireland, and he believed that they objected to the form of inquiry it was proposed to introduce. It was absurd to say that Dissenters were afraid of such an inquiry, but they felt that there was a great difference between the admission of right in the Government to make such inquiry, and one founded upon the free will of the people themselves. He had himself given notice of an Amendment, which he believed would produce the most accurate Returns that could be obtained of the religious opinions of the people generally. He repudiated the allegations that had been made of any wish on the part of the Dissenters to conceal their numbers.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS said, he could not allow the debate to close without expressing his satisfaction at the result that had been arrived at. He did not believe it was a fact that the Roman Catholics of this country were indifferent on this question. He knew from communications which he had in private with many persons, that the Roman Catholics would object to any declaration of religious profession as much as any other body of men. It had been said that the members of the Church of England did not object to the question of religious profession being stated; but he thought that they would be taking a very short-sighted view of the case if that were true, and he believed it was for the interest of the Church that details of this character should be suppressed.

Amendment agreed to; the words "religious profession" struck out.

MR. CHILDERS said, that in the Irish Census the state of education of the population was taken, and he thought it desirable the same should be done here. With that object, he moved in line 29 the insertion of the word "education."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was afraid that the insertion of that word would convey no intelligible meaning as to the kind of return required. Before sitting down, he wished to reply to the statement which had been more than once made during the debate, that he had offered an intentional insult to the Dissenters of this country. Now, he was not aware what part of his remarks was open to any such interpretation; and he was quite unconscious of having intended any such insult, or of having used any expressions which could be fairly construed into an insult. There appeared to be great sensitiveness in the minds of many Dissenters on the subject of the proposed census. He was at a loss to know what he had said which could be taken as an affront to them, for the expressions which he attributed to the Dissenting body were in many instances used by their own representatives and organs. The hon. Member (Mr. Baines) thought it uncourteous and unfair to say that there was a want of reason in the objections urged by the Dissenters. In stating the grounds on which the Government had submitted their proposal, he had certainly said that these were reasonable grounds; and having examined the objections taken on the other side, he had also said that, in his opinion, they were not founded on reason, but, according to the statement of the Dissenters themselves, rested rather upon feeling than upon argument. That was not his expression; it was used by the hon. Gentleman himself. Was there anything improper or unfair in this treatment of the subject? As hon. Members knew, this was not the first time that faith and reason had been opposed to each other. The greatest advocates of religion had maintained that it was impossible to scrutinize faith by the light of pure reason. He gave the Dissenters credit for being animated on this question by a strong, fervid, and sincere religious feeling; but he must be allowed to retain his opinion that their objections to the proposal of the Government were not founded on reason.

Amendment negatived.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY proposed at the end of the clause to add the following words, taken from the American Census instructions:—"And of all places where educational instruction is imparted to the youth of the land."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the propriety of including educational statistics in the census had been considered before the Bill was introduced. The fact was that the Education Commissioners, who had made extensive inquiry on this subject, had obtained educational statistics extending over a considerable part of the United Kingdom, the sum of £10,000 being assigned to them for defraying the cost of their inquiries. They would report upon the subject in full, and the information which they had procured would be quite sufficient, he believed, for all practical purposes. That being so, the Amendment was unnecessary.

MR. ADDERLEY reminded the Home Secretary that the Commissioners had only taken certain selected districts of the country.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, their statistics, though certainly incomplete, would be sufficient to serve as a guide for the whole country.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he thought the Amendment too valuable to be dismissed without more consideration. By a recent Act certain employers would be prevented from engaging the services of boys except on production of a certificate that they had attended school, signed by a competent schoolmaster. The information elicited by the hon. Baronet's proposal would afford valuable assistance in carrying that Act into effect, whereas the statistics of the Commissioners would not supply what was requisite.

Sir George Lewis

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied, that if the Amendment were adopted the information obtained would not individualize the schools; it would enumerate, without describing them, and would not assist in the administration of the Mines Regulation Bill. To do that it would be necessary to have a complete register of schools, not taken at intervals of ten years, but renewed from time to time. Hon. Members who desired to engraft upon the Census Bill provisions for securing educational statistics must remember that the operation was an expensive one. The enumeration, the printing, and the digest of the proposed educational statistics would probably add not less than £30,000 or £40,000 to the cost of the Census, which, as it was, would amount to more than £100,000. Believing that the grant made by the Treasury to the Commissioners would elicit sufficient information for all practical purposes, he was not disposed to allow a new inquiry of this nature.

LORD JOHN MANNERS observed, that as there was no religious, there should be no educational census.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; as was also Clause 5.

Clause 6 (Enumerators to take account of Houses, &c., and to distinguish the Boundaries of Parishes, Boroughs, &c.).

MR. CAIRD moved in line 31, to insert after the word "division" the words "with particulars as to the number of rooms having windows in each house." There could be no better means of coming at accurate information as to the material improvement of the people than by inquiry as to the improvement that had taken place in their dwelling-houses.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that one great objection to the window tax was that it caused an intrusion into private houses. He believed that if an enumerator went into a house to count the windows in each room, he would stand a good chance of being summarily ejected.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Government had consulted with those who had managed the Census in former years, and were advised not to insert any particulars in addition to those which they had put into the Bill. Besides this he did not think the information sought for by the hon. Gentleman would be of any practical use.

MR. CAIRD said, his object was not to obtain an account of the number of dark rooms in a house, but the number of openings which it had for the admission of fresh air.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to; as were also the remaining clauses.

MR. BAINES proposed a clause requiring returns of all places of worship, schools, and educational establishments, similar to those obtained in the Census of 1851, under the heads of "Public Worship" and "Education." He made this proposal because he was of opinion that it was desirable to have the fullest and fairest census—religious and educational. At the same time, it was not his intention to divide the Committee on that subject. He thought the clause of great importance, and gave it up with reluctance, in deference to the opinions of others.

Clause negatived.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he hoped that in the Scotch Census Bill, a similar clause to that which had originally stood in the English Bill, for obtaining information as to religious professions, would be inserted. The members of the Established Church of Scotland would have no objection to it, and if the Dissenters objected, they could state their objections when the Bill came before the House.

MR. CAIRD said, he had received strong representations from Dissenting bodies in Scotland against such a clause.

MR. DUNLOP had received similar representations.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate would state what course the Government intended to take with reference to the Scotch Census.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

CENSUS (IRELAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (By whom account to be taken).

MR. MONSELL moved to insert the words "religious profession."

MR. HADFIELD said, it was strange that Ireland should be the only country from which a Return was to be obtained of the religious profession of the population. The words did not appear in the Bill of 1850.

Motion agreed to.

Clause agreed to; as were also the remaining Clauses.

House adjourned at six minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, July 12, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Dominica Hurricane Loan; Admiralty Court Jurisdiction.
2nd Indemnity; Local Taxation Returns.
3rd Law and Equity.

INDIA—PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he wished to ask the Lord Privy Seal, Whether he was in a position to state the cause of the delay which had arisen in the distribution of the booty taken by Sir George Whitlock's force at Kirwee. The circumstances were these. Kirwee had been in the possession of two chiefs named Nardain Rao and Madho Rao, relatives of the late Peishwah, and cousins of Nana Sahib. On the occurrence of the outbreak or mutiny they declared themselves against us, cast fifty guns, raised troops, and corresponded with Nana Sahib, gave assistance to the defeated troops of the Nawab of Banda, and were in all respects rebels. On the advance of Sir George Whitlock their force dispersed, and they ultimately gave themselves up. That was on the 3rd of June, 1858, and all their property was taken possession of by the British troops. The treasure found in their palace amounted to a large sum. They had in coin and bullion £430,000, and jewels of the estimated value of £300,000, in addition to a sum of £90,000 which they had plundered from the ryots. The latter amount was paid over to Mr. Commissioner Mayne, of Banda. They possessed also £325,000 in the Government 5 per Cents, which were confiscated. The sum of £430,000 and the jewels were placed in the treasury at Allahabad; the money was credited to Sir George Whitlock's force, and 5 per cent interest was allowed. Not one rupee of the amount, however, had yet been distributed, it remained in the treasury; and, like many other sums over which the State had no honest control, he was afraid it had figured in the statement of Mr. Wilson as money which might be disposable by the Government so as to enable them to dispense with a further loan. The Governor General stated early in 1858, or towards the end of 1857, that all movable property of the rebels, such as was ordinarily treated as prize, was in this case to be so considered; but to this hour he had never seen any Order in Council—and if any such existed he was totally unaware of it—declaring under what conditions the booty taken in India was to be distributed. He must say that in this case, as well as in that of the Delhi and Lucknow prize money, a very great want of consideration for the army had been shown by the authorities. Such a state of things was of great public detriment. It was considered in a certain degree to have contributed to that lamentable catastrophe, the mutiny of one half of the local European army, an event most deplorable in itself, but still more deplorable from the course which Her Majesty's Government had pursued in consequence of it. In reference to this subject he would read to their Lordships a paragraph from the one of the papers laid on the table on the subject of amalgamation of the two European armies:—

“For years past a painful conviction had pervaded the army that the Government had not behaved fairly to it in the matter of prize, a conviction which led to the destruction in Lucknow alone of property to the extent of many thousands of pounds, to the destruction, indeed, of all frangible property which could not be appropriated by the captors, who (and the men were not Company's soldiers) declared ‘Government should make nothing by it.’”

This was the state of feeling which was produced in the army by a neglect of their interests. The soldier was naturally desirous to possess at once that which he had gained, sometimes to be at once employed—in many cases to be sent home to his family. Certainly nothing could be more important to the public interest than that the sums gained gloriously in war should be at once distributed to the soldiers. It was as necessary for the Government of India to be on good terms with the army, as it was for the Government of England to be on good terms with the people, for it was by the army alone that we maintained that empire.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that having received notice of his noble Friend's question, he made application to the Secretary of State for India, and the answer he received was that no report whatever had been received by the Indian Government with reference to the distribution of booty in question. His noble Friend was aware that the Secretary for India had no power to move in the matter, that the Indian Council were the ordinary judges in the matter of prize, and that the home Government could only review. He had received no information whatever of the circumstances connected with the capture of Kirwee.

The Earl of Ellenborough

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, this statement of the noble Duke showed that the state of things was a great deal worse than he had supposed. There was booty captured to the extent of £1,150,000 so far back as June, 1858, and yet, not a word respecting it had been sent to the home Government.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, this was only one of a series of disrespectful acts of the Indian Government towards Parliament. In the face of the statutory law, which called for an annual production of all matters relating to the Indian revenue, they were left for years and years in perfect ignorance of these affairs. When his noble Friend was connected with the India Board he was at great pains to obtain the information—in fact, he was bound to do so, because he and the noble Earl were parties to the passing of the Bill which compelled the Indian Government to furnish information. But this was the second year in which he called their Lordships' attention to the wilful neglect and contemptuous disregard of their statutory duty which the Indian Government exhibited. This year there was not even that attempt at excuse which was made last year for the neglect of the form in which these accounts were to be furnished. He thought the Government at home were in some measure responsible for this contempt and disregard of the statute law.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the last time the noble Lord complained of the non-production of these accounts the noble Earl opposite declared that it was physically impossible to furnish them in the time. Whether that were so or not, this matter now under discussion had nothing whatever to do with those accounts.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: The Government of India is better off in cash by pretty nearly a million, to say nothing of the paper money, than it was before, and has never said a word about it.

LORD MONTEAGLE: And they are bound to give us all information as to their finances.

JEWS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee on the Jews Act Amendment Bill read.

LORD LYNTHURST said, that when first this Bill came up from the other House it was not his desire to have anything to do with it. He certainly did not approve the form in which the Jewish Disabilities Bill went down to the other House, but he did not think it respectful to their Lordships to ask them so soon to reverse their decision. When, however, he found that the Amendments which he suggested and which he now intended to move would be assented to, he consented to take charge of the Bill. It was their Lordships' intention, in passing the Jewish Disabilities Act, that a Resolution by the House of Commons should become a permanent provision. It turned out afterwards that the House of Commons had no power to make such a provision permanent and that the Resolution must be renewed every Session. To obviate the inconvenience it was thought that the Resolution might be turned into a Standing Order. But the Speaker was of opinion that the House of Commons had no power to convert a Resolution originating in an Act of Parliament into a Standing Order. This Bill did not go further than to carry into effect the intention of their Lordships, and to enable the House of Commons to convert the Resolution into a Standing Order. The Amendment which he should propose in Committee would be this—

“Whenever the House of Commons shall order that any Resolution, pursuant to the first Section of the said recited Act in the same Session, shall be a Standing Order of the House, any Member professing the Jewish religion may thenceforth be sworn pursuant to such Standing Order as long as the same shall continue in force.”

Their Lordships would perceive that in fact the Bill would enable the House of Commons to do that which it was supposed by this House, when the Act passed, they had the power of effecting—namely, converting the Resolution into a Standing Order, so as to prevent the necessity of renewing it at the commencement of every Session. After the Bill had passed through Committee pro forma and the Amendment was inserted he proposed to reprint it.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that the Bill, although a short one, and apparently of a very unpretending character, was nevertheless one of considerable importance, and which certainly ought not to have arrived at this stage without receiving more notice than had yet been given to it. He had given an intimation to his noble and learned Friend that although he did not intend to oppose the Bill, he wished to make some observations upon it. He supposed he was not understood, for the second reading had taken place without his having had the opportunity of making his remarks; and therefore, although what he had to say would have been more applicable to the second reading, he trusted their Lordships would indulge him in the few observations which he wished to offer on the kind of legislation which the House of Commons proposed by this Bill. Their Lordships must recollect that, pending the discussions which took place in that House on the long-agitated question of the admission of the Jews into Parliament, a noble Earl (the Earl of Lucan) came forward as a peacemaker, and proposed an arrangement by which each House would be at liberty to exercise an independent course of action by a Resolution, and if it thought fit, when any person professing the Jewish religion presented himself at the table to be sworn, those important and well-known words “On the true faith of a Christian” might be omitted. As he understood the compromise, it was not the intention of the Legislature that any Resolution passed by the House of Commons should have the force of an Act of Parliament. The intention, as he understood it, was that the Resolution should be binding on the House of Commons during the Parliament in which it was adopted, and not beyond. From the part which he (Lord Chelmsford) had taken for so many years in this important question, he was not at all pleased with the arrangement; but finding that a great majority of their Lordships were anxious for some settlement, he offered no opposition, although he felt at the time it never could be considered anything more than a temporary arrangement, not a final settlement of the question. However, the Act of Parliament passed; and he certainly was very much astonished to hear that any difficulty had arisen as to its construction. It seemed to him to be so very clear and plain that it required great ingenuity to find a different meaning from that which the Legislature intended. It was the intention—and he thought the intention was very clearly expressed in the Act—that the Resolution should continue in force during the Parliament in which it was passed if not repealed. But he understood it was the opinion of a very high authority in the House of Commons that the Resolution was only operative in the particular Session in which it was passed, and that it would not continue in operation during the continuance of a Parliament. He (Lord Chelmsford) on the contrary apprehended that the Resolution would have the effect which every Resolution passed by the House of Commons would have, which was, as he understood, that it would continue during the continuance of the Parliament which passed it, unless previously repealed. And that was the intention of the Legislature in passing the Act. The words of the Act were,

"Where it shall appear to either House of Parliament that a Person professing the Jewish Religion, otherwise entitled to sit and vote in such a House is prevented from so sitting and voting by his conscientious Objection to take the Oath which by an Act passed or to be passed in the present Session of Parliament has been or may be substituted for the Oaths of Allegiance, Supremacy, and Abjuration in the Form therein required, such House, if it think fit, may resolve that thenceforth any Person professing the Jewish Religion, on taking the said Oath to entitle him to sit and vote as aforesaid, may omit the Words 'and I make this Declaration upon the true Faith of a Christian,' and so long as such Resolution shall continue in force the said Oath, when taken and subscribed by any Person professing the Jewish Religion to entitle him to sit and vote in that House of Parliament may be modified accordingly."

However, it was the opinion of a high authority in the Commons that this Resolution would only have this effect during the Session in which it was passed; and accordingly they appealed to their Lordships for some assistance to obviate this unsettled state of things, and they had sent down this Bill, which certainly went very far beyond their Lordships' original intention that neither House should interfere with the other, and that each might independently pass a Resolution to enable a Jew to take his seat: whereas the House of Commons applied to their Lordships to consent to a law by which permanently any person professing the Jewish religion might omit the words "upon the true faith of a Christian." He was not surprised that his noble and learned Friend had positively refused to take charge of the Bill unless the Amendment which he had read were introduced. They had, of course, entire confidence in his noble and learned Friend, and, therefore, it might be assumed that that would be the shape of the Bill. As he had already intimated he considered the Bill in that form entirely unobjectionable. But he could not withhold a remark or two on the unnecessary character of this Amendment. If he were right in his construction of the Act, the Resolution which the House of Commons was enabled to pass was binding during the Parliament, unless there was a decision to the contrary. It was proposed by the Amendment that the House of Commons should have the power of making their Resolution a Standing Order. He did not know that any greater effect would be given to their Resolution when it was converted into a Standing Order than what it had during the time it existed in the original form of a Resolution. Upon that point there was a great authority in their Lordships' House, to whom he would appeal.

Lord Chelmsford

LORD EVERSLEY: A Resolution of the House, strictly speaking, would not be valid beyond the Session during which it was passed. A Standing Order would remain valid in succeeding Sessions until repealed.

LORD CHELMSFORD: If that was the case, there could be no objection whatever to their Lordships agreeing to the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend. As they were treading on rather delicate ground in legislating with regard to the House of Commons, he trusted, however, that his noble and learned Friend had the sanction of the authorities of that House for the alteration he proposed.

LORD BROUGHAM strongly recommended their Lordships not to dissent from the Bill as proposed to be amended by his noble and learned Friend. That their Lordships had the clear and undoubted right to reject the Bill, he held to be so clear a proposition as to require no enforcement by argument. That their Lordships had the power to reject any Bill sent up from the other House, in the whole or in part, he held to be incontrovertible. A Bill sent up from the House of Commons for imposing a tax, they had a right to refuse—to refuse the tax. A Bill sent up to repeal a tax, their Lordships had a right to refuse, and thereby to insist that the tax continue. If a Bill was sent up from the Commons enacting one tax and repealing another their Lordships had a right either to reject that Bill altogether, and require the tax to remain in its existing shape, or to reject part and adopt part—to reject the part which imposed a new tax and to adopt the part which repealed an old tax. He knew that it was not usual to do so. He knew that it was contrary to the usual course of legislation in the two Houses that their Lordships should take that course; it was contrary to precedent, right or wrong, to take that course; but that it was their undeniable right he had not the shadow of a doubt. Nay, he would go further, and say that their Lordships had a right to originate in their own House a measure enacting a tax and to send it to the other House: "Whereas it is expedient that a certain sum shall be levied by a tax on the people in order to meet the exigencies of the public service: be it, therefore, enacted;" and the Lords passed a "tax" Bill. He (Lord Brougham) would not say that the other House would give such Bill a very cordial reception: he would not take upon himself to say that they would give it even a respectful reception: probably the Commons would reject it altogether. They might reject it in not the most courteous manner. Nay, probably they might treat it as Bills of this description had been treated before in the other House, and actually throw it out by bodily force. And so also it was the undoubted prerogative of the Crown to refuse the Royal Assent to any Bill, even though sent up from both Houses of Parliament without a dissentient voice in either. It was an undeniable right of the Crown to refuse its assent. No doubt the Ministers who advised the Crown so to refuse assent to such a Bill would be answerable to the country for the advice which they gave their Sovereign; but that the Sovereign had an undoubted right so to refuse assent he held to be a perfectly clear proposition.

LORD TEIGNMOUTH rose to call the noble and learned Lord to order. His observations had nothing to do with the question before the House.

LORD BROUGHAM said, it would be seen to be applicable enough when he came to apply his argument to the Bill before them. He would not say he should make it clear to the understanding of the noble Lord, but he would undertake that it should be clear to the understanding of 99 out of every 100 who might hear or read what he was now saying. He held it to be the right of every branch of the Legislature—of the Crown, of the Lords, of the Commons—to take such a course; but it was a different thing to say that in any given case that power should be exercised, and he held that in some cases the exercise of an undeniable right might be as inexpedient though not so illegal or unjust, as the exercise of that which was no right but a wrong; and he held that to reject this Bill, which dealt entirely and singly with proceedings of the other House of Parliament, which applied to the manner of taking their seat by Members of that House, which carefully excluded all reference to the House of Lords, which was simply and solely a Bill for regulating matters respecting only Members of the other House of Parliament taking their seats; to reject this Bill he held would not only be inconsistent with former precedent, but inconsistent with the respect due to the House of Commons, and inexpedient in every point of view. The right of their Lordships to do any act did not prove any the least justification of doing that act. Their proceedings, though quite lawful, might be both inexpedient and unconstitutional. The Bill gave effect to what was understood at the time to be the intention of this as well as the other House of Parliament; and he (Lord Brougham) thought that the mode in which the Bill intended to give effect to that intention, now that a difficulty had arisen, was unexceptionable.

House in Committee.

LORD LYNTHURST proposed the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Amendment agreed to.

The Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

HOLYHEAD HARBOUR OF REFUGE.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

THE EARL OF MAYO, in moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the state and efficiency of the Harbour of Refuge at Holyhead, said he should arrange the statement he had to make under four heads:—first, the number of shipwrecks that have occurred during the last twelve months inside the harbour; second, the principal defects of the harbour; thirdly, the silting up of the harbour; and fourthly, the enormous increase on the original estimate. And as to the first point, the number of vessels wrecked within the harbour, the following account of the vessels that were wrecked inside the new Refuge Harbour at Holyhead on the 27th and 28th of April, 1859, is taken from The Shipping Gazette of the 29th of that month:—

"April 27: The Richard, of Whitehaven, sunk. The Mary Anne, of Preston, stranded in the New Harbour. April 28: The Royal William, from Dublin for Liverpool, sunk in the New Harbour. The Anne, of Swansea, sunk. The Byzantium

during the Parliament in which it was passed if not repealed. But he understood it was the opinion of a very high authority in the House of Commons that the Resolution was only operative in the particular Session in which it was passed, and that it would not continue in operation during the continuance of a Parliament. He (Lord Chelmsford) on the contrary apprehended that the Resolution would have the effect which every Resolution passed by the House of Commons would have, which was, as he understood, that it would continue during the continuance of the Parliament which passed it, unless previously repealed. And that was the intention of the Legislature in passing the Act. The words of the Act were,

"Where it shall appear to either House of Parliament that a Person professing the Jewish Religion, otherwise entitled to sit and vote in such a House is prevented from so sitting and voting by his conscientious Objection to take the Oath which by an Act passed or to be passed in the present Session of Parliament has been or may be substituted for the Oaths of Allegiance, Supremacy, and Abjuration in the Form therein required, such House, if it think fit, may resolve that thenceforth any Person professing the Jewish Religion, on taking the said Oath to entitle him to sit and vote as aforesaid, may omit the Words 'and I make this Declaration upon the true Faith of a Christian,' and so long as such Resolution shall continue in force the said Oath, when taken and subscribed by any Person professing the Jewish Religion to entitle him to sit and vote in that House of Parliament may be modified accordingly."

However, it was the opinion of a high authority in the Commons that this Resolution would only have this effect during the Session in which it was passed; and accordingly they appealed to their Lordships for some assistance to obviate this unsettled state of things, and they had sent down this Bill, which certainly went very far beyond their Lordships' original intention that neither House should interfere with the other, and that each might independently pass a Resolution to enable a Jew to take his seat: whereas the House of Commons applied to their Lordships to consent to a law by which permanently any person professing the Jewish religion might omit the words "upon the true faith of a Christian." He was not surprised that his noble and learned Friend had positively refused to take charge of the Bill unless the Amendment which he had read were introduced. They had, of course, entire confidence in his noble and learned Friend, and, therefore, it might be assumed that that would be the shape of the Bill. As he had already intimated he considered the Bill in that form entirely unobjectionable. But he could not withhold a remark or two on the unnecessary character of this Amendment. If he were right in his construction of the Act, the Resolution which the House of Commons was enabled to pass was binding during the Parliament, unless there was a decision to the contrary. It was proposed by the Amendment that the House of Commons should have the power of making their Resolution a Standing Order. He did not know that any greater effect would be given to their Resolution when it was converted into a Standing Order than what it had during the time it existed in the original form of a Resolution. Upon that point there was a great authority in their Lordships' House, to whom he would appeal.

Lord Chelmsford

LORD EVERSLEY: A Resolution of the House, strictly speaking, would not be valid beyond the Session during which it was passed. A Standing Order would remain valid in succeeding Sessions until repealed.

LORD CHELMSFORD: If that was the case, there could be no objection whatever to their Lordships agreeing to the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend. As they were treading on rather delicate ground in legislating with regard to the House of Commons, he trusted, however, that his noble and learned Friend had the sanction of the authorities of that House for the alteration he proposed.

LORD BROUGHAM strongly recommended their Lordships not to dissent from the Bill as proposed to be amended by his noble and learned Friend. That their Lordships had the clear and undoubted right to reject the Bill, he held to be so clear a proposition as to require no enforcement by argument. That their Lordships had the power to reject any Bill sent up from the other House, in the whole or in part, he held to be incontrovertible. A Bill sent up from the House of Commons for imposing a tax, they had a right to refuse—to refuse the tax. A Bill sent up to repeal a tax, their Lordships had a right to refuse, and thereby to insist that the tax continue. If a Bill was sent up from the Commons enacting one tax and repealing another their Lordships had a right either to reject that Bill altogether, and require the tax to remain in its existing shape, or to reject part and adopt part—to reject the part which imposed a new tax and to adopt the part which repealed an old tax. He knew that it was not usual to do so. He knew that it was contrary to the usual course of legislation in the two Houses that their Lordships should take that course; it was contrary to precedent, right or wrong, to take that course; but that it was their undeniable right he had not the shadow of a doubt. Nay, he would go further, and say that their Lordships had a right to originate in their own House a measure enacting a tax and to send it to the other House: "Whereas it is expedient that a certain sum shall be levied by a tax on the people in order to meet the exigencies of the public service: be it, therefore, enacted;" and the Lords passed a "tax" Bill. He (Lord Brougham) would not say that the other House would give such Bill a very cordial reception: he would not take upon himself to say that they would give it even a respectful reception: probably the Commons would reject it altogether. They might reject it in not the most courteous manner. Nay, probably they might treat it as Bills of this description had been treated before in the other House, and actually throw it out by bodily force. And so also it was the undoubted prerogative of the Crown to refuse the Royal Assent to any Bill, even though sent up from both Houses of Parliament without a dissentient voice in either. It was an undeniable right of the Crown to refuse its assent. No doubt the Ministers who advised the Crown so to refuse assent to such a Bill would be answerable to the country for the advice which they gave their Sovereign; but that the Sovereign had an undoubted right so to refuse assent he held to be a perfectly clear proposition.

LORD TEIGNMOUTH rose to call the noble and learned Lord to order. His observations had nothing to do with the question before the House.

LORD BROUGHAM said, it would be seen to be applicable enough when he came to apply his argument to the Bill before them. He would not say he should make it clear to the understanding of the noble Lord, but he would undertake that it should be clear to the understanding of 99 out of every 100 who might hear or read what he was now saying. He held it to be the right of every branch of the Legislature—of the Crown, of the Lords, of the Commons—to take such a course; but it was a different thing to say that in any given case that power should be exercised, and he held that in some cases the exercise of an undeniable right might be as inexpedient though not so illegal or unjust, as the exercise of that which was no right but a wrong; and he held that to reject this Bill, which dealt entirely and singly with proceedings of the other House of Parliament, which applied to the manner of taking their seat by Members of that House, which carefully excluded all reference to the House of Lords, which was simply and solely a Bill for regulating matters respecting only Members of the other House of Parliament taking their seats; to reject this Bill he held would not only be inconsistent with former precedent, but inconsistent with the respect due to the House of Commons, and inexpedient in every point of view. The right of their Lordships to do any act did not prove any the least justification of doing that act. Their proceedings, though quite lawful, might be both inexpedient and unconstitutional. The Bill gave effect to what was understood at the time to be the intention of this as well as the other House of Parliament; and he (Lord Brougham) thought that the mode in which the Bill intended to give effect to that intention, now that a difficulty had arisen, was unexceptionable.

House in Committee.

LORD LYNTHURST proposed the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Amendment agreed to.

The Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

HOLYHEAD HARBOUR OF REFUGE.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

THE EARL OF MAYO, in moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the state and efficiency of the Harbour of Refuge at Holyhead, said he should arrange the statement he had to make under four heads:—first, the number of shipwrecks that have occurred during the last twelve months inside the harbour; second, the principal defects of the harbour; thirdly, the silting up of the harbour; and fourthly, the enormous increase on the original estimate. And as to the first point, the number of vessels wrecked within the harbour, the following account of the vessels that were wrecked inside the new Refuge Harbour at Holyhead on the 27th and 28th of April, 1859, is taken from The Shipping Gazette of the 29th of that month:—

"April 27: The Richard, of Whitehaven, sunk. The Mary Anne, of Preston, stranded in the New Harbour. April 28: The Royal William, from Dublin for Liverpool, sunk in the New Harbour. The Anne, of Swansea, sunk. The Byzantium

received considerable damage in New Harbour last night, by the brig Queen, running athwart hawse. The brig Richard, of Whitehaven, drove against the upper sea wall and fills with the tide; supposed to be much damaged. The smack Amlwch Packet, employed carrying stone for the harbour works, sunk at the same place. The schooner J. Annie, of Swansea, on shore at the upper part of the harbour. The brig Reaper, of Whitehaven, on shore on the beach. The above vessels, either by parting their cables or driving from their anchors, have come into collision with others and damaged them, but in consequence of the storm continuing, particulars cannot be obtained at present. The Queen, Wilton, of and from Chepstow, for Whitehaven, was towed in with loss of both masts, bowsprit, and all the gear attached thereto, a complete wreck, by dragging foul of the barque Byzantium, Harris, from Matanzas for Liverpool, in the bay last night; she slipped both anchors. The Vigilant, Belgian ship, slipped both anchors, and was towed in from the bay with loss of mainboom, boat, and bowsprit sprung, and bowsprit-shrouds carried away. The Gipsy was towed in with loss of both anchors, having slipped them in the bay. The Royal William, brigantine, parted from her anchors in the New Harbour last night, drifted alongside the quay and sunk. The Mary Anne, schooner, which drove on shore in the New Harbour last night, fills with the tide, and must discharge. The Mary Elizabeth sunk in the New Harbour; and a small smack in the Old Harbour also sunk."

It thus appeared that on the 28th of April, 1859, no fewer than seven vessels were sunk and five others seriously damaged inside the New Refuge at Holyhead. The next occasion that the merits of the harbour were tested was on the 26th of October last. The effect of the gale is thus described by The Times :—

"A large part of the breakwater works at Holyhead have been destroyed, and vessels anchored far inside and sheltered, compared to where the Great Eastern lay, have either gone down bodily or been driven high and dry ashore. . . . Within the very extremity of the breakwater, where one would have thought the Channel fleet might have ridden through any gale, much damage had been done. High and dry ashore under Holyhead mountain lay a fine barque, and around her, in the same predicament, were three smaller vessels. Out in the centre of the harbour the tops of two slender tapering masts showed where Captain Henry's beautiful schooner yacht, the Mariquita, had gone down bodily. Immediately behind this last was another and larger vessel, which had apparently only escaped the same fate by driving on the rocks."

On the same occasion the Great Eastern had narrowly escaped destruction; and upon two occasions (26th and 27th) when it was deemed advisable to remove her to more sheltered positions, her anchors could not be raised until they broke. Again, on the occasion of her departure for Southampton on the 4th of November following, Captain Harrison was again obliged to strain the chains until the anchor broke :

The Earl of Mayo

"And from the marks," says The Times reporter, "upon the anchor and chains, both of which were deeply scratched, it was supposed that the anchor had sunk through the mud until it nipped in rocky ground, and then held till the last strain broke it."

The following Return from the Board of Trade shows that three other vessels were wrecked in the Harbour in January and February last :—

Jan. 27, 1860.—The barque Robert Mills, lying with two anchors down in heavy gale of wind, dragged broadside on to the breakwater, and lay there thumping and making water until the wind shifted to the W.N.W., when she swung to her anchors again, and was towed for safety to Old Harbour.

Jan. 30.—The schooner William Henry put into Holyhead New Harbour for safety, and when beating out and endeavouring to clear a brig, ran upon the rocks and filled.

Feb. 27.—The barque Robert Mills let go anchors off the new breakwater Holyhead, but she drove and continued driving until she got on the Penrhyn Rock in Holyhead Bay, when she became a total loss.

So well, indeed, was the danger of the harbour understood, that he was informed that the Liverpool merchants had warned their captains against entering it, and the Royal Charter passed it in a heavy gale of wind the evening before she was wrecked, and would have entered it had it been a safe harbour. He would now proceed to show what were the principal defects of the harbour, and also that they were brought before the Government before the measure had received the sanction of Parliament. When the Bill for forming the Harbour of Refuge was introduced in the Commons in 1847, the citizens of Dublin petitioned against it on the following grounds, as stated in the Report of the Naval Commissioners, 1847 :—

"First, That Holyhead being situated on a bold coast, and bounded by dangerous rocks on a lee-shore, exposed to the violent action of the prevailing winds, and to unusually rapid tides, is not a fit place for a Harbour of Refuge.

"Second, That the entrance being in the teeth of the prevailing winds, no vessel could enter the harbour at such times when shelter is most required.

"Third, That, as by far the largest portion of the bottom of the area proposed to be enclosed by Mr. Rendel was found, after careful examination, to consist of rock, it would be impossible that vessels could, in storms or rough weather, anchor with facility or security within the proposed harbour.

"Fourth, That from the rapid increase of the Stanley Sands in the direction of the proposed harbour, there would be great liability to its being choked up with silt, or a bar being formed at its entrance."

The shipowners of Liverpool also presented a petition to Parliament, and which contained the following paragraph:—

"That your petitioners are strongly impressed with the inexpediency of laying out the immense sum of money necessary for the construction of an Harbour of Refuge (so desirable on some part of that coast), at the port of Holyhead, on the ground that the rocky nature of the bottom of the greatest part of such harbour would render it unsafe, if even possible to anchor ships there; and they venture to hope that Her Majesty's Government, before finally adopting that port for such purpose, will institute further inquiries on the subject."

Shortly after these petitions had been presented, and in consequence of them, a Commission, consisting of three naval officers, was appointed to inquire into the merits and demerits of the plan. The Commission sat on the 14th of June, and closed their inquiries on the 16th; but in the meanwhile the Bill had been read a second time on the understanding that no further proceedings should be taken until the Report of the Commissioners had been a reasonable time in the hands of Members. Notwithstanding this arrangement the Government appointed a Select Committee on the Bill, which sat three days before the Report of the Commission was in the hands of the Members; and in consequence, the citizens of Dublin and Liverpool and those who opposed the scheme, had no opportunity of being heard. The civil engineers and nautical authorities who were examined before the Naval Commissioners were, Mr. Rendel, Sir John Rennie; Mr. Bald, Tidal Harbour Surveyor to the Admiralty; Mr. Page, Engineer to the Woods and Forests; Mr. Williams, Managing Director of the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company; Captain Christie, R.N. Mr. Williams stated, on behalf of his Company, that there appeared to be great doubts of the harbour being safe, on account of the bad anchorage shown by the Admiralty charts; the principal part of the site appeared to consist of a floor of rock; and in many cases the naked rock projected above the covering, and was so rough and uneven as to chafe the hawsers. Captain Christie stated that of 369 operations only four appeared to afford good holding-ground. Mr. Bald, being examined as to the anchorage ground, stated:—

"The edge of the coast from Ynys Wellt is low and rocky, as far as Holyhead Harbour." "There is a channel inside the Outer Platters; but as foul ground extends for some distance from both Ynys Cribi and Ynys Wellt, it would be imprudent to use it without the assistance of a pilot."

"And it is this space of water, with its foul rocky bottom, which has been proposed to be formed into an asylum harbour."

"It is unnecessary to mention that any asylum harbour which shall be formed at Holyhead without possessing good anchoring ground within it, will be a failure, and the case of Howth Harbour ought to be a sufficient warning. I am quite satisfied that had the important subject of the bottom and anchoring ground been sufficiently investigated, as to its being clean or foul, no asylum harbour would have ever been proposed and designed in a place so extremely objectionable. I examined the nature of the bottom; an iron chain 100 feet long, with a very heavy lead attached to it, was dropped down; the impression upon my mind at the time, upon looking at the nature of the shore and going over it was, that it was a floor of rocks."

The evidence of Sir John Rennie, Mr. George Rennie, and Mr. Page will be found confirmatory of Mr. Bald's.

He had now to draw their Lordships' attention to the evidence of the witnesses who were examined before the Naval Commissioners on the part of the Shipping interest of Liverpool. The first witness examined was Mr. Lockett, the Chairman of the Shipowners' Association of that Port. His evidence is as follows:—

Mr. Lockett: We have had many discussions before our board of shipowners respecting this harbour and the nautical gentlemen connected with it. We wish, first, to be certain as to the anchorage; because, if it is, as represented, a rocky bottom, if it is going to be enclosed in the manner laid down in this chart, it is considered it will be anything but a harbour of refuge for ships from Liverpool. Many gentlemen say, instead of its being a harbour of refuge in certain gales of wind, it will be a harbour of destruction.

Captain Askew, Harbour Master of Liverpool: My opinion of the bottom of the anchorage, is that which has been already represented, and I can only follow the language of Mr. Lockett in saying, that so far from its being a harbour of refuge, it will be one of destruction. I think the north breakwater, instead of being a protection, will be an injury. In a gale of wind from the north-west to the east-north-east, I defy any man to go along that wall. I am also given to understand it is principally rocky, with the exception of some patches of sand; if you take a vessel in there, and let go her anchor, and the anchor did not hold, as you cannot immediately take the canvass off, she must either go on the vessels which are there, or upon the rocks.

Mr. Irwin: On behalf of the shipowners of Liverpool I may add to what has already been observed, that I am quite certain they never would avail themselves of this intended harbour from the fact of its insecurity."

"Mr. Askew: It would be impossible to lay in safety in it."

The next point to which he desired to draw their Lordships' attention was that of the silting up of the harbour. The engineers examined before the Naval Commissioners in 1847 objected to the site chosen for the harbour of refuge on the ground of there being every probability that it was filling up. Mr. Bald stated that the Stanley Sands, through which the river Alaw runs, had advanced half a nautical mile in twenty-four years, and that in fact the proposed asylum harbour would prove only a cesspool to receive the silt and alluvium discharged by the Alaw; and a chart recently published, by Mr. Calver, one of the surveying officers of the Admiralty showed that diminution of ten feet in the depth of the new harbour had taken place since Captain Beechey surveyed the bay in 1840.

The importance which the late Sir Robert Peel attached to questions of setting may be gathered from his remarks on the Harbour of Dover in 1847:—

“ With respect to Harbours of Refuge, he could assure the hon. Member for Dover, that the subject had not escaped the attention of Her Majesty's Government. But if there were any one thing in respect to which the utmost precautions were unusually necessary, it was the spending of £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 of money in erecting Harbours of Refuge. He had himself lived to see a Harbour of Refuge constructed at an expense of hundreds of thousands of pounds, which harbour had become almost utterly valueless, because sufficient precaution had not been taken to ascertain the nature of its sedimentary deposits. The construction of such a work as Dover might involve an outlay, not of hundreds of thousands, but of millions; and before that work was undertaken, it was manifestly desirable that they should have the most reasonable grounds for believing that it would attain its purpose. He could not, however, deem it consistent with his duty to propose to the House of Commons an enormous outlay, without being able to show that every precaution had been taken; first, to insure the selection of the best place; and next, that every guarantee had been afforded that a work of that kind would, if undertaken, be so constructed as to afford the greatest possible amount of advantage to the public.”

He now came to his fourth and last point, the great increase on the original estimate. Mr. Rendel originally estimated the cost at £600,000; but the engineers who were examined before the Naval Commissioners gave estimates in detail to show that, instead of £600,000, it would cost little short of two millions:—

Mr. Page estimated the cost at	£1,500,000
Sir John Rennie at	1,800,000
Mr. George Rennie at	1,800,000
Mr. Bald at	1,900,000

Again, it will be found that the testimony of those eminent authorities has been borne out by the result; for, according to Mr. Hawkshaw's last Report to Parliament, the sum of £1,158,000 has already been voted for the works, and £762,000 more will be required to complete them, making the total aggregate estimate to the present time £1,920,000; but, according to the evidence of Captain Washington, Hydrographer to the Admiralty, before the Select Committee on Harbours of Refuge, 1858, it is clear that the total cost of the Harbour will be little short of three millions. He (the Earl of Mayo) had known the harbour since 1808; but in 1852, in consequence of a proposition to make it a great Atlantic harbour, he determined to make himself thoroughly acquainted with it. Accordingly, on his way from Ireland he stopped at Holyhead; saw the Engineer, or the gentleman who acted for him, and attentively examined the maps. He found rock, rock, rock, everywhere, and his study of the map increased his surprise that any one should recommend a large expenditure of money on such a place. On coming to London, he sent some papers on the subject to the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), who was then Premier. In 1859, a part of the great breakwater in course of erection was swept away, and the sea swept over it. Under all the circumstances, he could not but think it very much to be regretted that £1,500,000 should be spent upon this harbour, not of refuge, but of destruction. The citizens of Dublin and the merchants of Liverpool had petitioned against the expenditure of the public money in the formation of the harbour. The most experienced captains asserted that it was most unsafe for vessels in bad weather without the construction of a proper breakwater, which was estimated to cost £400,000; but if Holyhead was a safe harbour, what did they want with a breakwater? He trusted that the Government would grant him the Committee he asked for, because he believed he should be able to prove that the harbour of Holyhead, instead of being a harbour of refuge was really a harbour of destruction; and that there was no use in throwing good money after bad in the vain hope of making it truly effective for its purpose. The noble Earl concluded by moving—

The Earl of Mayo

“ That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the State and Efficiency or otherwise of the new Refuge Harbour at Holyhead, the Cause or Causes of the Number of Wrecks that occurred therein during the last Year; also to inquire into the Plan as now sanctioned by the Admiralty for the Construction of a Packet Harbour for the Accommodation of the large Class of Steamers about to be employed for the Irish Mail Service.”

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he could not take on himself any of the responsibility for the construction of the harbour at Holyhead, which had been undertaken at the recommendation of a Royal Commission appointed to report on the most suitable site for a harbour of refuge on that coast. He believed, however, that the outline of the harbour proposed by the late Mr. Rendel would have cost less, and would have afforded greater shelter, than the plan subsequently agreed to. But it was no use to regret what had taken place; their Lordships ought rather to determine whether Holyhead was really so defective as a harbour of refuge. After the great gale of the 25th or 26th of October, a letter was written from the Admiralty to the officer in charge to inquire what damage had been done to the breakwater, and likewise to the shipping. In reply it was stated that—

“The breakwater was uninjured. The sea did not break into the harbour; but at high water the crest of the waves came over the unfinished part of the breakwater. Some 600 feet of wooden staging was washed away, and a wooden building in which the red light was kept was destroyed. There were fifty-six vessels inside the Platters (rocks), and the Great Eastern lay outside in the roads.”

The following casualties were reported:—

“The England, bark, deep laden with salt, having already lost an anchor off Liverpool, put into Holyhead to get another, and had not supplied herself when the gale came on. She broke the fluke of her remaining anchor, and, falling foul of three smacks and a schooner, landed herself and them on the beach. They were got off with little damage. The Gipsy, schooner, ran in during height of gale, let go both her anchors, swung foul of a vessel, slipped one anchor in order to clear her, parted the chain of the other, and went on the rocks; she was much damaged. The Maraquitta, schooner yacht, was run foul of by a steam-tug, and thrown on the rocks. One or two other collisions occurred among the small craft, but no vessels dragged their anchors. The sea, with wind at east, was heavy for boats, but nothing to hurt a wholesome vessel, properly provided with anchors and chains. The harbour is easy of access, and proved itself perfectly safe. The Great Eastern was the only vessel in the outer roads, and was at single anchor; when the wind came to the north-east she swung and rode outside the shelter of the breakwater. She dropped a second anchor, and rode well all night. Next day she weighed one anchor, and, having steamed ahead for this purpose, her remaining anchor broke across the shank. On the 2nd of November she broke another anchor.”

But it was the opinion of the officer on the spot that she never was in any danger. Admitting that the money spent at Holyhead might have been laid out to greater advantage, that a larger area might have been enclosed, and that rocks which would now have to be blown up with gunpowder might have been avoided, he still thought the evidence went to prove that as a harbour of refuge it was not unsafe. As regarded its present condition, he felt it would be desirable in any case to complete the outer work, to prevent what had been already done from going to ruin; but before any new and expensive works were undertaken the matter should be submitted to the consideration of Parliament. Application had been made last autumn for the construction of a pier or jetty to accommodate the large new steamers which were to run between England and Ireland. In the original plan a solid pier was contemplated, which would have taken four or five years to complete, and the advantages of which would in the end have been very questionable. He therefore refused to countenance the outlay requisite for that purpose; but, regarding it as highly desirable that the public should enjoy the benefit of those vessels, he had sanctioned the erection of a wooden jetty at a cost of £9,000, which would be available for their passengers. If this did not prove sufficient, it would be necessary to consider the matter carefully next year; for, cost what it might, it would be requisite to establish a good communication between England and Ireland. He promised that the works in progress at Holyhead should not go beyond what he had now stated, and that the subject should receive the attention of Government. Under the circumstances, he hoped the noble Earl would not press his Motion.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE would not go into the general subject of harbours of refuge, but he thought it was perfectly clear that if in a harbour like Holyhead twenty vessels were lost in ordinary gales, that the prevailing winds were such that vessels could not enter, and that when in there was no good holding-ground or anchorage, there were certainly good grounds for refusing to expend larger sums of money than had already been expended. If the noble Duke would undertake to say that he would himself carefully and vigilantly look to the future progress of the work he had no desire to relieve the Government of the responsibility. The information they had was the only information they could acquire, and it required nothing but a sound judgment to take such measures as would prevent the public witnessing a further expenditure of public money, and of finding that they had no harbour of refuge after all.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE was of opinion that in a matter of such national importance a minister required a great deal more than merely sound judgment—he required considerable vigour in order to deal with and overthrow the proceedings of professional individuals, who domineered over men of sound judgment who were too apt to defer to those professional persons. The noble Duke had not contradicted any one of the statements that had been made. There was an expenditure of millions of money, and what was the justification for it?—that it was expended under the authority of the most eminent men. An eminent man, in fact, one who expended an immense sum of money, which made him still more eminent, and when the thing failed, who was responsible? Not the political head of the Government, because he had the best advice of the eminent man. Who, he wanted to know, was the eminent man to be condemned? He never heard of one. He had never heard of a Minister being censured, or of a public officer being dismissed, for all the money that had been thrown away. It had been mentioned before their Lordships' Committee that several of these harbours were useless, and that the money might just as well have been thrown into the sea. It was a poor consolation to tell them that they were to proceed with sound judgment if sound judgment was still to be fettered by professional engineers, who always would go on expending money on plans and systems which had failed for the last 3,000 years in all parts of the world. There were two harbours in existence at Holyhead. One was a harbour of refuge, built at an enormous expense, but not usable by packets, so that another had to be constructed for that purpose. He trusted that the noble Duke would take this question up with a determination to examine the matter and act for himself. After all this expenditure at Holyhead, the passengers had to embark and to disembark at a common wooden jetty, such as existed on the Thames, or at any watering place. He hardly knew of any harbour excepting Kingstown that had succeeded. He trusted the public money would not be further wasted on a work that was a monument of the folly of those eminent professional men who became eminent, not by the display of any skill, but by recommending enormous works to be constructed at an enormous expenditure.

The Earl of Hardwicke

LORD VIVIAN said, if anybody was responsible for the large expenditure, it was Parliament, which had sanctioned it. He recollected well a Select Committee of their Lordships sitting to decide as to the construction of a harbour of refuge at Holyhead for the Liverpool shipping. He did not know whether that exhibited "sound judgment," but having sanctioned the work, their Lordships must be held to have some share in the responsibility.

THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY said, they had it on the authority of Sir Edward Belcher, that the great fault was that Mr. Rendel's plan had not been carried out. He feared that an enormous outlay had been made for very little purpose; and that to have a harbour worth anything, they must revert to the original plan. He could conceive no inquiry more legitimate than that they should endeavour to ascertain the best plan for making the harbour. It had been suggested to refer the question to the Committee now sitting upon Breakwaters; but he thought it would be as well to refer it to the Admiralty, and that they should take care that no more money should be wasted on it and thrown into the sea. It was in evidence that the harbour was gradually silting up; and it was right an investigation should be gone into on that point, before there was a greater expenditure.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON trusted the serious attention of Her Majesty's Government would be directed to the subject. From all he had heard respecting the construction of the harbour, he thought it would be a difficult matter to elongate the pier in such a manner as to render it a safe retreat for vessels. The Breakwater, winter after winter, had been washed away, and never could get a firm holding. It was highly desirable for the traffic between England and Ireland that improved accommodation should be given; but he doubted, notwithstanding all this expenditure, whether they were not going from a bad Scylla into a worse Charybdis. He hoped that next Session the subject would be inquired into by a Committee.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he did not deny that Holyhead had not answered their expectation. But referring to what the noble Marquess had said with reference to eminent men, in fairness to the memory of the late Mr. Rendel, he must say that, first, his plan had not been followed out; that, secondly, it was not fair to expect that the harbour could resist every heavy gale, seeing that it was not completed. Excepting when the wind was from one particular point, Holyhead did afford a fair shelter for vessels. The question of a pier for packets was quite distinct from the question of the harbour as a place of refuge, and formed no part of the plan of Mr. Rendel.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that his observation upon engineers was a general one, and that he had no intention to apply it particularly to Mr. Rendel.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that having been acquainted with the eminent engineer, Mr. Rendel, it was impossible not to know how high he stood in the estimation of the profession, and how singularly clear-headed and able a man he was. If they were to avoid all professional advice, and especially eminent professional advice, he did not know how great national works were to be undertaken.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

House adjourned at half-past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, July 12, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Anchors and Chain Cables; Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act (1856) Amendment.

2^o Crown Debts and Judgments; Inclosure (No. 2); Railways Act (Ireland) (1851); Amendment; Weights and Measures (Ireland).

3^o Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh); Registration of Births, &c. (Scotland); Tramways (Ireland).

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 78 to 83 agreed to.

Clause 84 (Abolition of Office of Accountant).

MR. MURRAY observed that the office of Accountant was perfectly useless, and ought at once to be abolished. The clause proposed the abolition of the office on the death of the present occupant, but he thought that when an office was to be abolished it was a bad principle to wait till death. This business might very well be done by the Registrar. He, therefore, proposed the omission of that part of the clause which would retain the present Accountant in office.

Amendment proposed, in page 18, line 15, to leave out the words "the person now discharging the duties."

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the Amendment, so far from promoting economy, would place an additional charge upon the funds of the court, as they could not abolish the office of the Accountant in Bankruptcy without giving the present possessor of it compensation. Besides, he doubted whether it would be prudent to abolish the office of the responsible individual in whose name the enormous sums passing through the court were now paid; but at any rate, the most economical plan was that proposed in the clause, namely, allowing this gentleman to hold the office as long as he lived, and afterwards to entrust the duties to the chief registrar.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he hoped the hon. Member would take the sense of the Committee upon his Amendment. The Bill assumed that the office should be abolished when it next became vacant, and he, for one, could not understand why it should not be abolished at once. It was a most flagitious sinecure, and although the holder of it was called an accountant, he kept no accounts whatever. He trusted the Committee, in considering the Amendment, would not be alarmed by the question of compensation, which could be dealt with separately.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL asked the Committee to consider that if the office of Accountant was to be at once abolished they would have to pay the present possessor of it his full salary, while they left him nothing to do. That gentleman would, no doubt, in such a case feel that they had conferred on him a great benefit, for he would be relieved from the discharge of his duties, and yet be in the receipt of full salary. It was in these circumstances thought more prudent and more economical to retain that gentleman in his office, and avail themselves of his services, taking care that no future appointment should be made. He was quite willing to admit that there was no necessity for a separate officer of this kind, and therefore it was proposed to abolish such an appointment on the first vacancy that took place.

MR. MURRAY said, he did not object to give fair compensation to gentlemen in the position of the Accountant in Bank-on the one side, and the Galway Packet Company, as I may call it for the sake of clearness, on the other, for an assignment of the Galway Contract to the Montreal and Ocean Steam Packet Company; but that arrangement was of necessity subject to the consent of the Government, and an application was made two or three days ago for that consent, a copy of the assignment being also placed in the hands of the Government. At the same time an intimation was made to the Government that the answer must be an immediate one, as the matter would not bear giving time for consideration. Under these circumstances the Government really were precluded from giving any full consideration of the question upon its merits, and they did not hesitate to reply that without at all indicating what would have been the result if full time had been given for consideration, they could not sanction the assignment. The two gentlemen who hold office in Canada, and who had given Government to understand that the question was thus pressing, were to have quitted England, I believe, yesterday evening, and the answer then sent to them was considered by Government as a definitive reply, which indeed, it was, to the application made to them. This day, however, I have learned, only within the last few minutes, that one of those gentlemen has not quitted England. That gentleman, Mr. Smith, I believe, holds the office of Postmaster-General in Canada, and he has sent in a letter requesting that a more full consideration might be given by the Government to the subject. I have had no opportunity of communicating with my Colleagues since that letter was received, and I am not, therefore, enabled to make any statement in regard to it. With respect to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, I need hardly say that the advertisement he has quoted in his notice intimating that the Galway Contract had been transferred to the Montreal Ocean Steam Ship Company has not been authorized or sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government, and therefore it must be understood, of course, as meaning merely that the arrangement had been completed between the parties so far as they were concerned. With regard to the pledge stated to have been given to Mr. Inman, that no transfer of the Galway Contract should take place without affording him the opportunity of showing cause why such contract should not be transferred, it is perfectly true that a pledge of that kind was given to Mr. Inman, and, of course, the Government will take care that that pledge is redeemed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. BAXTER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, if the Government has sanctioned the sale of the contract and subsidy for conveying the mails between Galway and America; if the four new steamers, on the faith of the performance of which the large subsidy of £78,000 per annum was promised, are not after all to be placed upon the station; if it is true that the Atlantic Royal Mail Company are unable to fulfil the conditions under which they undertook the service, and have resorted to this sale or assignment in order to secure to their shareholders a large sum of public money without rendering any service; what is the sum for which the contract has been sold, and what course the Government mean to take, with a view to ascertaining the opinion of the House of Commons on these transactions?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, with respect to the information my hon. Friend has asked for, all I can tell him is this:—He is already aware that the assignment of the Contract has not been sanctioned by the Government. As to the four new steamers, on the faith of providing which the subsidy was promised, they would not, under the assignment, have been placed on the station; but other new steamers would have been provided by the Canadian Company, which, of course, would have been subject to certain conditions of inspection and approval. With regard to the alleged inability of the Atlantic Royal Mail Company to complete the service, Government have no official notice whatever. The sum stated in the assignment was £35,000 a year, to be paid for seven years; and with regard to the course which the Government intend to take in order to obtain the opinion of this House, that will depend on the decision yet to be come to, and therefore it is premature as yet to give any reply.

MR. HANKEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, When further Copies of the Report on the Defences will be delivered to the House for sale, as numerous applications have been made for the purchase of Copies which cannot now be obtained?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that 2,250 copies of the Report of the Commission on National Defences had been printed, and 500 distributed.

OFFICE OF POSTMASTER GENERAL.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, When a Postmaster General will be appointed; and when the Report on the Post Office will be laid upon the Table?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the duties of the Postmaster General had been performed by the Duke of Argyll in the absence of Lord Elgin. That arrangement had been made on the alternative that when Lord Elgin arrived at Ceylon he might find that his services were not wanted, and that he might return. Unfortunately the Chinese difficulty had not been settled, and it would fall to the duty of the Government to appoint a successor.

THE LEBANON MASSACRES.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary on the subject of the recent massacres in Syria, and that he might put himself in order, he would move that the House do now adjourn. The House would not be surprised that, having taken some part in the war in Syria some years ago, he should sympathize with the unfortunate victims of the massacres which had lately been committed in that country. He understood from a statement which had been made in "another place," that the Government had sent a squadron, under Admiral Martin, to Syria; but that force, although it might protect the inhabitants of Beyrout, Sidon, and other parts of the coast, would be of little advantage to the population of the interior. This was not the first time that atrocities of this kind had occurred in Mount Lebanon; and attacks made by the Druses upon the Maronites had been encouraged by the Turks. During the war of 1840 the allied forces saw a large party of Druses marching through the country with the heads of thirty Christians upon pikes. Unhappily no reliance could be placed on the Turks, who thought they had an interest in setting the Druses and Maronites by the ears, and were in the habit of standing by, and looking on complacently, while they destroyed each other. Unless the Maronites of the Lebanon had come forward in the gallant manner they did during the war in Syria, and assisted his small force in driving the Egyptians out of the country, that object could not have been accomplished. These unfortunate people were detested whenever they came into contact with the Druses, and he therefore, begged to ask the noble Lord the Foreign Minister for an assurance that some effectual steps would be taken to prevent further massacres among the Christians in the interior of Syria as well as on the coast, and also to afford protection to British subjects.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he rose to second the Motion, not for the purpose of making a speech, but of asking the noble Lord for some information, which he thought would be most acceptable, on this subject. The House, in common with the rest of the country, must have seen with deep pain and regret the accounts given by the newspapers of the recent shocking occurrences in Syria. He was anxious to induce the House, and if possible the country, while their information was still necessarily so imperfect, to suspend their judgment upon the responsibility for those events until it received more authentic intelligence. Great injustice would be done, and possibly great and permanent evil inflicted on that country if people here ran away with the idea that one party only had been to blame in this unhappy matter, or if the influence of England should cause vengeance to be taken upon one race alone, while others who were as much or perhaps more in fault than those who were at present victorious remained unpunished. Two years ago he spent some time on Mount Lebanon, where he resided for a short period with these very Druses, now accused of being concerned in the recent disturbances; and he thought the House would commit a very great mistake if it concluded that these disturbances had had in the main a religious foundation. He believed that they originated in an irreconcilable quarrel between antagonistic races, and that religion had in fact had very little to do with them. It was well known that two great races, the Druses and Maronites, divided between them the chief part of that fertile region, and he feared there must always exist a deep-seated hostility between them. Nor should it be forgotten that it was the interest, not only of the Turks, but of some European Powers to foment their contentions. He was sure the noble Lord, whose attention had been so much directed to this question, must be aware that other nations in Europe had constantly encouraged these disputes on Mount Lebanon with a view to

on the one side, and the Galway Packet Company, as I may call it for the sake of clearness, on the other, for an assignment of the Galway Contract to the Montreal and Ocean Steam Packet Company; but that arrangement was of necessity subject to the consent of the Government, and an application was made two or three days ago for that consent, a copy of the assignment being also placed in the hands of the Government. At the same time an intimation was made to the Government that the answer must be an immediate one, as the matter would not bear giving time for consideration. Under these circumstances the Government really were precluded from giving any full consideration of the question upon its merits, and they did not hesitate to reply that without at all indicating what would have been the result if full time had been given for consideration, they could not sanction the assignment. The two gentlemen who hold office in Canada, and who had given Government to understand that the question was thus pressing, were to have quitted England, I believe, yesterday evening, and the answer then sent to them was considered by Government as a definitive reply, which indeed, it was, to the application made to them. This day, however, I have learned, only within the last few minutes, that one of those gentlemen has not quitted England. That gentleman, Mr. Smith, I believe, holds the office of Postmaster-General in Canada, and he has sent in a letter requesting that a more full consideration might be given by the Government to the subject. I have had no opportunity of communicating with my Colleagues since that letter was received, and I am not, therefore, enabled to make any statement in regard to it. With respect to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, I need hardly say that the advertisement he has quoted in his notice intimating that the Galway Contract had been transferred to the Montreal Ocean Steam Ship Company has not been authorized or sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government, and therefore it must be understood, of course, as meaning merely that the arrangement had been completed between the parties so far as they were concerned. With regard to the pledge stated to have been given to Mr. Inman, that no transfer of the Galway Contract should take place without affording him the opportunity of showing cause why such contract should not be transferred, it is perfectly true that a pledge of that kind was given to Mr. Inman, and, of course, the Government will take care that that pledge is redeemed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. BAXTER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, if the Government has sanctioned the sale of the contract and subsidy for conveying the mails between Galway and America; if the four new steamers, on the faith of the performance of which the large subsidy of £78,000 per annum was promised, are not after all to be placed upon the station; if it is true that the Atlantic Royal Mail Company are unable to fulfil the conditions under which they undertook the service, and have resorted to this sale or assignment in order to secure to their shareholders a large sum of public money without rendering any service; what is the sum for which the contract has been sold, and what course the Government mean to take, with a view to ascertaining the opinion of the House of Commons on these transactions?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, with respect to the information my hon. Friend has asked for, all I can tell him is this:—He is already aware that the assignment of the Contract has not been sanctioned by the Government. As to the four new steamers, on the faith of providing which the subsidy was promised, they would not, under the assignment, have been placed on the station; but other new steamers would have been provided by the Canadian Company, which, of course, would have been subject to certain conditions of inspection and approval. With regard to the alleged inability of the Atlantic Royal Mail Company to complete the service, Government have no official notice whatever. The sum stated in the assignment was £35,000 a year, to be paid for seven years; and with regard to the course which the Government intend to take in order to obtain the opinion of this House, that will depend on the decision yet to be come to, and therefore it is premature as yet to give any reply.

MR. HANKEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, When further Copies of the Report on the Defences will be delivered to the House for sale, as numerous applications have been made for the purchase of Copies which cannot now be obtained?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that 2,250 copies of the Report of the Commission on National Defences had been printed, and 500 distributed.

OFFICE OF POSTMASTER GENERAL.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, When a Postmaster General will be appointed ; and when the Report on the Post Office will be laid upon the Table ?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the duties of the Postmaster General had been performed by the Duke of Argyll in the absence of Lord Elgin. That arrangement had been made on the alternative that when Lord Elgin arrived at Ceylon he might find that his services were not wanted, and that he might return. Unfortunately the Chinese difficulty had not been settled, and it would fall to the duty of the Government to appoint a successor.

THE LEBANON MASSACRES.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary on the subject of the recent massacres in Syria, and that he might put himself in order, he would move that the House do now adjourn. The House would not be surprised that, having taken some part in the war in Syria some years ago, he should sympathize with the unfortunate victims of the massacres which had lately been committed in that country. He understood from a statement which had been made in "another place," that the Government had sent a squadron, under Admiral Martin, to Syria ; but that force, although it might protect the inhabitants of Beyrout, Sidon, and other parts of the coast, would be of little advantage to the population of the interior. This was not the first time that atrocities of this kind had occurred in Mount Lebanon ; and attacks made by the Druses upon the Maronites had been encouraged by the Turks. During the war of 1840 the allied forces saw a large party of Druses marching through the country with the heads of thirty Christians upon pikes. Unhappily no reliance could be placed on the Turks, who thought they had an interest in setting the Druses and Maronites by the ears, and were in the habit of standing by, and looking on complacently, while they destroyed each other. Unless the Maronites of the Lebanon had come forward in the gallant manner they did during the war in Syria, and assisted his small force in driving the Egyptians out of the country, that object could not have been accomplished. These unfortunate people were detested whenever they came into contact with the Druses, and he therefore, begged to ask the noble Lord the Foreign Minister for an assurance that some effectual steps would be taken to prevent further massacres among the Christians in the interior of Syria as well as on the coast, and also to afford protection to British subjects.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he rose to second the Motion, not for the purpose of making a speech, but of asking the noble Lord for some information, which he thought would be most acceptable, on this subject. The House, in common with the rest of the country, must have seen with deep pain and regret the accounts given by the newspapers of the recent shocking occurrences in Syria. He was anxious to induce the House, and if possible the country, while their information was still necessarily so imperfect, to suspend their judgment upon the responsibility for those events until it received more authentic intelligence. Great injustice would be done, and possibly great and permanent evil inflicted on that country if people here ran away with the idea that one party only had been to blame in this unhappy matter, or if the influence of England should cause vengeance to be taken upon one race alone, while others who were as much or perhaps more in fault than those who were at present victorious remained unpunished. Two years ago he spent some time on Mount Lebanon, where he resided for a short period with these very Druses, now accused of being concerned in the recent disturbances ; and he thought the House would commit a very great mistake if it concluded that these disturbances had had in the main a religious foundation. He believed that they originated in an irreconcilable quarrel between antagonistic races, and that religion had in fact had very little to do with them. It was well known that two great races, the Druses and Maronites, divided between them the chief part of that fertile region, and he feared there must always exist a deep-seated hostility between them. Nor should it be forgotten that it was the interest, not only of the Turks, but of some European Powers to foment their contentions. He was sure the noble Lord, whose attention had been so much directed to this question, must be aware that other nations in Europe had constantly encouraged these disputes on Mount Lebanon with a view to establish their own influence in that quarter. While he was there himself two years ago it was well known that efforts were made by French and Russian agents to rouse hostile passions and excite disturbances in the mountain. From living there for a short time he became so sensible of the imminent danger thus threatened that he was induced to make a communication to the noble Lord, the then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the subject. He was sure the Government must have received intimations from the intelligent gentleman who was our Consul General at Beyrout, which must have placed them in possession of important information on this question. But great injustice would be done if the European Powers did no more than to leave these people to the tender mercies of their Mussulman rulers. If the Turks were enabled to establish their authority in the Lebanon in a more sovereign manner than they had lately exercised it, not only would that fertile and flourishing region be seriously injured, but there was great risk of its being reduced to the same state of misery as prevailed in other parts of Syria and to a great extent throughout the Turkish dominions. In most districts of Syria the traveller was struck with the squalid and wretched condition of the villages; but when he arrived in the Lebanon he observed evidences of the greatest wealth and prosperity among the inhabitants. On inquiry he would find the reason of this to be that the Porte had no immediate authority there, and the people were, so to speak, self-governed. But if the Turkish Pashas were now to be sent down to those regions for the purpose, as it was called, of allaying disturbances and checking disorder, they would be glad to have the opportunity of fleecing the unfortunate population and enriching themselves at their expense, producing under the name of tranquillity what was merely ruin and desolation. He was satisfied Her Majesty's Government must also see that other dangers were impending. France would probably not be unwilling to gain the means of establishing her power in the East. He had seen a report in the newspapers, and he believed the Government had made statements to the same effect, that assurances had been received from the French Government that it was their determination not to interfere in this matter beyond securing protection to French subjects. But could they depend upon such assurances? Had not similar assurances been given respecting countries nearer home? And, knowing that the interest which France took in this question was not only political but religious, were they sure that these disturbances would not be fomented by French agents as affording an opportunity for establishing that influence which she had long been anxious to gain in the East? The question was so interesting, and involved considerations of such magnitude and importance, that he trusted the House would pardon him for having seized that somewhat irregular occasion for claiming its attention.

Sir James Fergusson

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that having had a personal acquaintance with these regions, he wished to corroborate what had been so well stated by the hon. Baronet, and to express his hope that the House and the Government would not hastily espouse the cause of either of these contending races.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I quite agree with the hon. Baronet (Sir James Fergusson) that no doubt we must be very cautious in imputing the blame of these unhappy transactions to one of the parties concerned rather than the other. It is well known that the Druses and the Maronite Christians have long been divided by sentiments of deep-seated hostility; and those sentiments have from time to time broken out in wars and contentions. Unfortunately there has lately been such an occurrence. With regard to the immediate cause, one party lays the blame upon the other, while the other party says that it was the first who attacked them. No doubt there have been individual murders on both sides. Whatever may be the cause of the outbreak, and whatever measures it may be desirable to adopt, I think the House can have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the European Powers are bound to do their utmost to put a stop to the massacres which have been going on. We have been told first one village and then another has been attacked by the Druses, and that great slaughter had ensued, and our Consul informed us that he believed that not less than 20,000 people were wandering in the mountains in a state of the greatest distress. The hon. and gallant Officer (Sir Charles Napier) says, that merely sending ships to the sea coast will not save those who are in the mountains. Undoubtedly that is true, but when the Turks are reproached with regard to the apparent indifference that they have shown, or at all events the very little exertion they have made, there is this to be said, that during the winter reports have been very current and very prevalent indeed, that in Bosnia, the Herzegovina, and Bulgaria, there would be risings in the course of the spring. The Sultan naturally directed regular troops to be sent to those districts, and his army not being very large, I am told by the Turkish Ambassador in London that at the time of this outbreak there were only 400 regular troops in Syria. Of course it was not to be expected that 15,000 or 20,000 armed men should be put down by this small number of regulars, but even allowing for that, I am afraid it is too true that the Turks have showed but little activity or desire to put down these disturbances. It appeared to us that it was desirable to have ships on the coast, not only for the protection of British subjects, but in order that the Pasha who might be sent from Constantinople should be better enabled to send troops into the interior, and to relieve Damascus from the apprehensions of an attack which have lately prevailed there. We were informed that at Damascus there was the greatest apprehension of an attack by the Druses, and, of course, the British Consul and British subjects there were in the utmost danger. The Pasha who was sent from Constantinople might have said, "I should be ready to put an end to the massacres in the mountains and to relieve Damascus, but it will be necessary to keep all the troops on the coast, in order to prevent the Christians and the foreign subjects there being murdered." Therefore, it will be a great satisfaction to him if he is enabled by the presence of foreign ships of war to feel quite at ease with respect to Sidon, Beyrout, and other places on the coast, and to transfer his troops to the neighbourhood of Damascus. To show the effect that may be produced by even a very small force, I will state that while these massacres were occurring an English gentleman was cruising in the neighbourhood of Tyro with his yacht. Repeated messages were sent requesting him to approach the harbour, and place himself in a position to protect the town, and ultimately, although his guns were of very small calibre, and could be of little use, he warped in and placed them in a position to command the entrance to the town. It afterwards appeared that there were then in the town two spies of the Druses, who that same night sent word to the camp that an English ship of war was in the harbour, and that an attack in the face of such a force would be of no use. There was no attack, and the place was saved. This shows that not only a British naval force, but what may be taken to be a British naval force, may save the lives of the inhabitants of the seaports, and prevent massacres which were likely to take place. The graver subject to which the hon. Baronet has adverted is one of very large extent, and one into which I cannot properly enter now. It is one which must be considered by the representatives of all the Powers at Constantinople. I do not believe that those jealousies or those wishes to obtain influence on the part of European Powers which have acted so powerfully in former days would now be detrimental to the settlement of the question, and I quite agree that the Turks ought not to be allowed to extend their power, which frequently does not so much establish order as corruption and venality, over this district. At the same time it is very desirable to provide, if possible, that these very hostile parties should live in peace together.

MR. GREGORY said, he wished to call the attention of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the fact, that there was a servant of Her Majesty who, if he was upon the spot, would have more influence upon the tribes of the Lebanon than any demonstration, naval or military, which the noble Lord might propose to send out. The gentleman to whom he alluded, and who was, he believed, well known to every one who travelled in Syria a few years ago, was Mr. Wood, our Consul-General at Beyrout. He was a gentleman of great ability, and when Consul at Damascus obtained an influence among the mountain tribes such as had been possessed by no other European. He spoke the language like a native. He was thoroughly acquainted with Oriental sentiment and opinion, and by means of various good offices which he had done to different sheiks and rulers of tribes in the mountains he had obtained a personal influence among that people which was perfectly extraordinary. He believed that if that gentleman was sent to Syria in the present emergency he would be able to exert an influence most material to the settlement of this question, and would afford to Her Majesty's Government information which, amid the conflicting testimony that would be received, would be most important and most reliable.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he understood that the Turks were in 1846, by a Treaty with what were called the Five Powers, bound not to occupy the district in which these massacres took place with troops, and it therefore seemed rather hard to blame them for these occurrences.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The hon. Baronet is wrong in his statement. There is no treaty which excludes the Turks from Lebanon in the same manner in which they are excluded from the Principalities. There was an arrangement made a good many years ago according to which no Turkish administrative authority was to be paramount in Lebanon, but the people of that district were to be left to govern themselves under officers appointed from the races therein. For a long time great endeavours were made by the Turks to get out of that engagement, but they were held to it, and I believe that it is still in existence. It does not, however, preclude them from appointing a Pasha to represent the Turkish authority in those districts.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn," put, and negatived.

THE NELSON MONUMENT.

QUESTION.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: It has long been subject of reproach, not wholly undeserved, that this country, with all its generosity and undoubted reverence for the memory of those who have reflected honour on the name of Englishmen, is generally slow in rearing monuments to preserve her sense of their high merits. On the Continent the battle has scarcely been won, the laurel earned by the living, or the grave closed above the last resting-place of the heroic dead, than the statue is erected, or the scene of victory portrayed. Half a century has elapsed, however, since the great conquest of Trafalgar, and the entombment of the man who won it in the crypt of St. Paul's, and still in the greatest thoroughfare of this Metropolis, his Monument, to our shame, remains unfinished. This House has done its duty in furnishing the funds sufficient to render it complete; but for some inexplicable cause, hitherto, the eyesore remains, although the design was entrusted to the charge of an accomplished artist, who, I should have thought, with his fertile genius and great capacity for the work, would have found no difficulty in furnishing it without a delay so protracted. I must, therefore, ask, with whom, or with what department the blame rests? "I bear it for immortality," said an old Roman, when he held one handle of the plough, whilst Death held the other. Such was the spirit which animated Nelson, the greatest of English Admirals, whose memorable signal is still the watchword for every successor of the profession he so largely adorned, and whose name needs neither statue of bronze, or tomb of granite; for it is written not only in the living hearts of his countrymen, but also in the memory and history of every civilized nation in the world. When I turn my eyes to the stupendous works and materials of our naval ports and harbours; when I bring before my eyes the number of our ships built and maintained at so great a charge to present an armed front and impenetrable barrier to our enemies, I still cannot but recollect that to secure that end we must man those wooden walls with hearts such as beat in the breast of Nelson, and that the highest incentive to duty which a country can offer to the living, lies in the gratitude which she has displayed to her worthy and heroic dead. In such a spirit, and for this reason, I ask, why is the Monument of Nelson suffered to remain incomplete?

Mr. Gregory

MR. COWPER assured the hon. and gallant Admiral that the delay in the completion of the Nelson column was not to be attributed to any want of veneration for the character or exploits of Lord Nelson. The delay had arisen from a contrary feeling, from a desire that the lions which were to adorn the base of the column should be worthy of the position in which they were to be placed, and worthy also to represent the British Lion. Sir Edward Landseer, whose acquaintance with animals in general was well known, had now been selected for the purpose; and the House might rest assured that in producing representatives of the British Lion, his patriotic feeling would not suffer him to exert himself less than he had done in making likenesses of all other animals.

ITALY.—SARDINIA AND SICILY.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I rise, Sir, according to notice, to move an Address for copies or extracts of papers relating to the threatened annexation of Sicily to Piedmont, and to any information received by Her Majesty's Government as to the probable demands of France consequent upon the event of that annexation taking place; also for any papers showing that Her Majesty's Government have within the last few weeks intimated to the Government of Turin that the continued aggressive policy of that Government would not be viewed with indifference by Great Britain. I trust the House will not think I have selected an inopportune moment for calling its attention to the threatened annexation of Sicily to Piedmont and the probable demands of France, and I trust also the House will concur with me in the hope that Her Majesty's Government may have intimated to the Cabinet of Turin their apprehensions with respect to the aggressive policy of Piedmont. The latter part of my notice I am bound in fairness to say is taken almost word for word from a question which was asked in 1848 by the Earl of Aberdeen with reference to the affairs of Sardinia. It applies with tenfold force to the circumstances of the present time, and I hope the House will not grudge me a few minutes while I direct its attention to the State of European affairs, particularly those of Italy.

In referring to the threatened annexation of Sicily, and the probable demands of France, it is impossible not to cast a glance for a moment over the course and history of the events which are occurring on the shores of the Mediterranean, fraught as they are with the deepest interest, and calculated to give rise to serious complications among the different States of Europe. The question of Sicily directly and immediately concerns England, both commercially and in a maritime and political point of view. It concerns England commercially, because, of course, she cannot withdraw from commercial intercourse with other countries, nor, with a due regard to her material interests, can she remain an indifferent spectator of the fate of European nations. It also concerns England in a maritime and political point of view to an infinitely greater extent than those questions which have recently given rise to so much discussion, such as the cession of Nice, the sale of the poor Savoyards, and the outrage upon the integrity and independence of Switzerland. The Mediterranean is and ever has been the great highway for the traffic of Europe. Dr. Johnson said it ought to be the centre of trade and civilization, for upon its shores all the greatest empires of the world had flourished—Assyria, Persia, Greece, Rome, and Carthage—and from its shores we had derived our laws, our arts, everything which raised us above the savage and the slave. If the Mediterranean was of such immense importance in former times, what must be its position and character now? I do not hesitate to say that the maintenance of our commercial and political interest in the Mediterranean at the present moment is almost of as great importance as the maintenance of our maritime supremacy in St. George's Channel or the Irish Sea. In that opinion I only concur with every English statesman of modern times. A debate took place in this House in 1810 upon the condition of Sicily, the independence of which we maintained against the aggressive power of Bonaparte. Mr. Perceval was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he said in words of great force and singularly applicable to the present moment that all Governments in this country—men of all parties—had held that our connection with Sicily was of value in a political point of view, as well as with reference to our commercial interests at Malta and other parts of the Mediterranean. He added, "There is no difference of opinion as to the importance of preserving the independence of Sicily from the grasp of Bonaparte." We want to do that now. We know from the experience of the last few months that Sardinia is merely a tool in the hands of the Emperor of the French. We know that by opposing to the utmost extent of our power the influence which France wishes to acquire, both in Syria and in Sicily, we are maintaining that political influence which we are entitled to exercise in those parts of the world.

The question being so important, I want the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office to give us a frank explanation of the policy he is pursuing. I do not want it to be said, as it has been said on recent occasions, "Oh! you are too late; the thing is done; the annexation has taken place." I want to warn the noble Lord that he must not be too late in the present instance, that he must not tell us some weeks hence, "Oh! we have been deceived by Earl Cowley, or outwitted by M. Thouvenel and Count Cavour, or duped by the franchise and cordality of the French Emperor." The noble Lord told me the other day that I should not pay any attention to newspaper reports, and that if I only listened to what he said I should know the truth. I want to know the truth above all things, and, therefore, I address myself to the noble Lord. But I do not think the noble Lord can say that we are over-anxious or over-curious on the subject of our foreign relations. The state of Europe is alarming, and would justify far more discussion than has yet taken place in either House of Parliament. It is calculated to cause us great anxiety and even distress of mind. Italy is in a ferment. There is no cohesion in Italy. From the Prussian Provinces on the Rhine I get letters which assure me that there is a general feeling of mistrust and apprehension, as against a common enemy. In Germany there is an attempt at union, which I hope may be successful—also against a common enemy. In Switzerland there are 176,000 men ready to rally round the standard of the Republic in defence of its rights and interests. Solely in consequence, I believe, of the unsettled state of affairs on the Continent, we are arming to a greater extent than we have done for the last forty years, and we are contributing more of our money than we ever did before for improving and extending our maritime and military defences. We talk not only of the defence of our ports but of the Metropolis. We have even called out Volunteers—a force which has not been seen among us for half a century, and I am glad of this opportunity, as some remarks which I made on a recent occasion have been misunderstood, to pay my tribute of admiration to the zeal, discipline, and efficiency of which we had so magnificent a display in the presence of the Queen some weeks ago in Hyde Park. I hope their services may never be required in the field; but I firmly believe that our Volunteers would prove themselves, if necessary, no unworthy defenders of the interests and institutions of England. But to return—I think the posture of affairs on the Continent is more serious at the present moment than it was in 1848. In that year we had a Sicilian revolution and the mission of Lord Minto. I was abroad at the time, and well recollect the visit of Lord Minto to Italy. I have always retained a very agreeable souvenir of the kind and friendly manner in which he received me, but, looking at his visit in a political point of view, I say it was theatrical. It was a revolutionary fasco. At the time of the Sicilian revolution Lord Minto went to Rome. He coquetted with the Roman Liberals, visited

Sir Robert Peel

Ciceroachio, praised Pio Nono, and patted Ferdinand of Naples on the back; but he deceived the Sicilian patriots and compromised the British Government. Though Foreign Affairs were not half so important in 1848 as at present, yet these subjects relating to Italy were then the occasion of no less than fifteen separate debates, while in the present year, such has been the forbearance of Parliament, that we have hardly had one debate on the affairs of Italy. I therefore call upon the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary to make a statement of his views to-night on this important subject. The noble Lord has spirit and capacity to do so when he chooses. I have read the despatches which he has laid on the table, and I take pride in thinking them worthy of an English Minister. As a Member of the English Parliament I thank the noble Lord in the name of Switzerland for the manner in which he has defended the interests of that country and of Europe, and if the noble Lord would only go on like that, he will find in me as vigorous and generous a supporter as in any hon. Gentleman in this House.

In casting a glance over the course of events on the Italian shores of the Mediterranean, it is impossible not to advert to the achievements of Garibaldi, which have been universally accompanied by the sympathy of public opinion. The career of Garibaldi has been the subject of manifestations in this country—in Glasgow, Manchester, and other places—and he has elicited unqualified approbation from all classes in this country. Nevertheless, his progress and success have given rise to great difference of opinion in Italy; yet I am bound to say, as regards the expedition to Sicily, that, putting aside all political considerations, I can conceive nothing more glorious than the exploits of Garibaldi from the time of his leaving Genoa, with the revolutionary connivance of the King of Sardinia, up to the moment of his becoming Dictator at Palermo. All these details have been so admirably laid before the public by a correspondent, that I feel it would be a work of supererogation now to dwell on them. Garibaldi's rapid progress shows what the perseverance and prestige of one energetic man can accomplish. But when we read that an army of 20,000 men, well equipped and furnished with all the appliances of war, capitulated and laid down their arms before 2,000 men, ill equipped, with a bad commissariat, but who gained possession of the forts, the harbour, and the treasury, then, I say, the achievements of Garibaldi assumed a character of such moment as forbade the Powers of Europe to remain indifferent spectators of them. I do not lay so much stress on the mere fact of 20,000 men laying down their arms, for we all know what influence a panic has sometimes on men. At Milan, in 1848, the whole Austrian army under Radetzky ran away before a wholly unarmed population; and yet that same army marched back from the Mincio to the Ticino in a few months, annihilated the whole Sardinian army, and recovered the position they had before lost. In saying this I do not wish to diminish the splendour of Garibaldi's achievements. I could almost liken him to Miltiades, who with a handful of men obtained on the plains of Marathon immortal renown for his success against all the hordes of Asia. Garibaldi has perplexed all the calculations of warfare. But we must not be dazzled by his triumphs; we must look to the political consequences which would infallibly ensue from them. After Garibaldi was made Dictator at Palermo there were cries of not only "Viva Italia!" but also of "Viva Vittore Emmanuele!" I suppose all was arranged between France and Turin; but when Garibaldi allows the people to cry out "Long live Victor Emmanuel, King of Sicily," I ask, can this be the same king who only the other day sold like sheep in the shambles, or slaves in the market-place, so many thousands of his most devoted subjects? Before this man is taken for a King of Sicily a warning voice should ring from the valleys of Savoy to teach the people of Sicily, before it is too late, what he who sold the liberties and interests of his Savoyese subjects—a race devoted for generations, for centuries to his family, and the rock and mainstay of his inheritance—is capable of doing towards newly acquired subjects. We have in this country a strong feeling of patriotism—and I know what the feeling is—but if I were a Sicilian patriot I would almost consent to continue for some time longer in the dungeons of Castellamare, rather than bow before such a false god of patriotism. They call him "Il Rè galantuomo;" and if you want a translation of that term, you may ask the citizens of Nice, or the mountaineers of the Alps. I deeply deplore the fact that the salvation of Italy is to be worked out between political treason on the one hand, and a military despotism on the other. I cannot see how the interests of Italy can profit by such a junction. They want Victor Emmanuel to be King of Sicily; and I will therefore show what its condition was when a Prince of the House of Savoy was sovereign of the island. By the treaty of Utrecht, Sardinia was ceded to Austria, and Sicily to the Duke of Savoy. In 1714 Victor Amadeus II. was crowned King of Sicily. He went to his new kingdom, proclaimed a parliament, and promised all kinds of liberties, after which he went away, and soon began to intrigue, as it seemed to be the habit of all the Savoy Princes. In 1718 he intrigued with the Spaniards to drive out the Austrians from the Milanese territory. The Spaniards did so, but then they turned round on their allies and drove them also from Sicily. The domination of the Spanish Bourbons thus began in 1736; and it is now in its very last agony. I make no allusion to the time when Sicily was in the hands of England, in 1806, and when we held it against the whole force of France until we gave it up at the peace. I wish to allude for a moment to the mission of Lord Minto, which took place in 1847 and 1848. By the advice of the present Prime Minister, then Secretary for Foreign Affairs, he went to Naples, and recommended the separation of Sicily from the dynasty of Naples. He allowed Admiral Parker to salute the flag of Sicilian independence and took other steps to make that independence complete. Allow me for a moment to call the attention of the House to an extract from a despatch which was written by the present Prime Minister to Mr. Abercromby with respect to that offer. The noble Lord, on the 8th of May, 1848 wrote in the following terms:—

"With reference to the offer of the Crown of Sicily to the Duke of Genoa, you will state to the Sardinian Government that it is, of course, for the Duke of Genoa to determine whether it will or will not suit him to accept this flattering offer; but that it might be satisfactory to him to know that if he should wish to do so he would, at the proper time, be acknowledged by Her Majesty."

In 1848, therefore, the Government of this country distinctly stated that they were prepared to see a separation of Sicily from the Crown of the two Sicilies effected, and the sovereignty of the island committed into the hands of a Prince of the House of Savoy. Now, what I want to know is whether the policy of the noble Lord with regard to the question is the same to-day as it was at the period to which I am referring? Does he now desire that Sicily should not only be separated from Naples, but united to Sardinia, and thus thrown into the grasp of a man who is the mere tool and instrument of the Emperor of the French?

I do not wish to trouble the House by quoting at length from the recent despatches of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in reference to the affairs of Italy, and I am happy to think it is unnecessary for me to do so, inasmuch as the great majority of hon. Members have no doubt read them with the attention which they merit. The noble Lord, however, I am bound to say, has not shown the same vigour in his despatches upon the affairs of Naples which he has manifested in those which relate to the House of Savoy. The noble Lord in one of the former despatches uses a somewhat curious expression. He says he always wished well to the dynasty on the throne of the Two Sicilies. But in 1848 the noble Lord did not wish well to the throne of the Two Sicilies, because he told Lord Minto that Her Majesty's Government would support a separation. Again, on the 22nd of June I find the noble Lord writing to Mr. Elliot in these words:—"Her Majesty"—he does not say Her Majesty's Government—"is sincerely desirous to see the dynasty now on the throne of the Two Sicilies maintained and consolidated." These sentiments, I repeat, are not in accordance with the policy of 1848, and I wish the noble Lord would be good enough to inform us what is the cause of the change. But to proceed—Mr. Elliot turns round upon the noble Lord, and informs him that the Government of the two Sicilies persists in maintaining itself by a direct violation of the law. This statement does not, however, appear to exercise much influence over the mind of the noble Lord, for on the 2nd of July he writes to say "Her Majesty's Government"—not simply Her Majesty as before—"desire to see the present dynasty of Naples maintained on the throne." But we have Mr. Elliot on the 17th of July again stating that the King's Government was based on a continued denial of justice, and, more than that, the noble Lord himself on the 16th of January, admitted that "the commonest rules of justice were not observed." The noble Lord in that very same despatch proceeds to say, "We wish well to the Neapolitan dynasty. We recommend the establishment of a representative constitution. We do not offer any opinion on the details of such a measure,"—it would perhaps have been appropriate that the noble Lord should not do so at the time, because we were then upon the point of having our own £6 and £10 debates—"but we recommend free discussion, a popular assembly, and public opinion as the chief ingredients." Now it appears to me that if the noble Lord was anxious to stand forward as the advocate of those blessings, he need not have gone quite so far as Naples for the purpose. In thus criticising these despatches, no one of course, will for a moment suppose that I entertain any feeling in favour of acts of cruelties so atrocious as those which the King of Naples is said to have committed. I have read authentic reports of those acts, and have learnt upon indisputable evidence the crimes which this military despot has perpetrated. I cannot understand how now, in the nineteenth century, the people of a nation which had once tasted the blessings of constitutional freedom could be content to submit without a murmur to a rule which maintained no semblance of liberty or of law. The noble Lord recommends them to try "free discussion, popular assemblies, and public opinion;" but, as I said before, he need not go so far as Naples to seek fitting objects for such advice. He has only to look across the Channel to perceive that those despatches which he sent to the Court of Naples may with great force be addressed to the Emperor of the French. Now, let me add that almost every one of us—laying aside all political meaning—sympathize with the proceedings of the heroic Garibaldi. Such, however, let it be clearly understood is not the case with the noble Lord, who has done everything he could to stop him in his career. Let there be no mistake on this matter. I think it was the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer) who, on the 4th of May last, put a question to the noble Lord with respect to Naples, to which he returned the following reply:—

Sir Robert Peel

"The Ministers of the King of the Two Sicilies have from time to time communicated with us, which shows a reliance, a great reliance on the friendship of Her Majesty's Government. Upon one occasion there was a report that General Garibaldi was going to Sicily with armed ships. The Government of the Two Sicilies immediately applied to Her Majesty's Government to endeavour to stop that expedition, and I lost no time in applying to the Sardinian Government, asking them, if they had any authority over Garibaldi, not to allow him to proceed."

It is quite evident that the course which Garibaldi has taken has not the approval of the noble Lord; but, be that as it may,

I trust he has no desire to see Sicily united to Sardinia, which is intriguing under the cover of Garibaldi. But while these intrigues are going on promises are, it seems, being made of a free Constitution and every sort of good to the Sicilians if they will only give way. I, however, very much doubt whether the Sicilian patriots will be disposed to place much reliance on those promises, seeing how often they have been already deceived. In 1848, on the recommendation of the noble Lord, a Constitution was offered to the Sicilians, an offer which, when matters assumed a more favourable aspect, was ignored. Nay, more, the King of Naples sent General Filangieri to bombard and destroy Messina, while those very men who supported him in his constitutional policy—Poeri and Settembrini—were consigned to spend years of misery in a dungeon because they had shown themselves faithful to the liberties of their country. In 1821, also, a Constitution was promised, as it is to-day, and immediately withdrawn. I repeat, therefore, that I hope the Sicilian patriots will not be deceived by those promises, and that we shall have that independence secured to Sicily—either through the medium of a guarantee on the part of the Powers of Europe, or by some other means—which she has shown herself so fit to enjoy. The noble Lord at the head of the Government, when asked the other evening what course Her Majesty's Ministers would be prepared to take with reference to any suggestions that might be made to them on this subject from the Court of Naples, made use of the following remarkable words:—

“It is the fault and fortune of such Governments as that of Naples, when, by the cruelties and atrocities committed under their authority, their subjects have been driven to desperation and have revolted, that they appeal to all friendly Powers for assistance to remove the men who are the authors and instigators of those revolutionary movements, and if their prayers were granted, and steps taken to accomplish the object they desired—unless, which is very unlikely, they were prepared to alter their own course—the first, most effectual, and only necessary step would be their own removal.”

Now, that was a straightforward and generous answer to return, and on the sentiments which it expresses I, for one, fully participate. I have now to thank the House for allowing me to address them at such length. I will merely say in conclusion that I do not profess to see any solution of the existing difficulties of Sicily. I can only hope, as I said before, that Her Majesty's Government will not sanction the union of that island with the Crown of Sardinia. We have already enough on our hands without encountering the complications which such a policy must involve. The state of Europe is sufficiently alarming, and, more than that, we know that great danger will be likely to result if the influence of France is allowed to acquire in Sicily predominant power. Now, I want to see the political influence of England maintained. Much has been said during the Session of her power and resources, and no one can deny their greatness at home. I, however, should wish to behold her enjoying abroad that influence which she is entitled to exercise, and employing it for good, for we know that, whatever may be the extension of our wealth or the growth of our commerce, the prosperity of the country cannot in reality be said to be based upon a sound footing unless we maintain due political weight in Europe. I do earnestly trust, then, that Her Majesty's Government will take every opportunity to secure and consolidate that political influence; for, if one iota of it be abated, if you allow the prestige of the country to be dwarfed and narrowed, in the same proportion will her greatness undergo diminution. But if, upon the other hand, you are prepared to act upon the policy which I have pointed out and to uphold unimpaired that influence “which has grown with our growth and strengthened with our strength”—then will the Parliament and people of England be able to look with confidence to the progress of passing events, while she herself will continue to retain that high position among the nations of Europe which, during the last half century has shed so magnificent a lustre on the annals of her history.

Amendment proposed,

“To leave out from the word ‘That’ to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies or Extracts of Papers relating to the threatened annexation of Sicily to Piedmont, and to any information received by Her Majesty's Government as to the probable demands of France consequent upon the event of that annexation taking place; also any Papers showing that Her Majesty's Government have within the last few weeks intimated to the Government of Turin that the continued aggressive policy of that Government would not be viewed with indifference by Great Britain,”

—instead thereof.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I cannot deny—indeed—I freely admit the ability, sincerity, and generosity of the hon. Baronet who has just spoken. I will readily admit likewise that I have to thank not only him and others who share his political views, but also hon. Members opposite for the forbearance which they have shown in a very difficult period of foreign policy. I have not to complain, therefore, that the hon. Baronet should take this occasion, on going into Committee of Supply, to ask what are the views of the Government with regard to the present state of Italy. At the same time I must say that, as the hon. Baronet went on from one topic to another, I was much at a loss to gather from his observations what was the policy he would recommend. I own I was puzzled to know whether he wished that the King of Naples should be enabled to assert his authority in Sicily, and that the influence of Her Majesty's Government should be used for that purpose, or whether he desired that the people of Naples and Sicily should be free to choose for themselves that kind of government which they prefer. Sir, in looking at this subject, one must consider what has happened since 1815, and more particularly the events of last year. In 1815 Austria had allotted to her Lombardy and Venetia, but her influence was not confined to those territories. From 1815 to 1859 she extended her influence over every part of the peninsula; and when the political influence, which a great country such as Austria possesses, was not sufficient, she sent her armies to put down the institutions which the people had chosen for themselves, and to restore absolute dominion. The present Prime Minister of Austria has been obliged to confess that that system has failed. Well-intentioned, as he maintains it was, towards the people of Italy and the general state and balance of power in Europe, he cannot deny that the result of that policy has been such as to make the Italians averse from Austrian rule and to compel Austria to renounce that policy for the future. Well then, Sir, what has happened. From 1848 to 1859 France and Austria occupied by their arms parts of the Roman States. In 1859 it happened, as it was very likely to happen in some year or other, without any one being able to fix the precise epoch, the King of Sardinia excited the people of Italy to resist foreign domination. He assured them that he felt for their agony, and that he sympathized with their griefs; and at that time he obtained the assistance of France to enable him to oppose Austria. This country, under the guidance of the Ministry of the Earl of Derby, refrained from taking any part in that war, and that neutrality was applauded and supported by all parties in Parliament and all classes in the country. Assuming that position, therefore, it was not for us to expect any of the rewards or spoils which might be the results of the contest. It appears now that at the very commencement of the war France had stipulated, not in a formal treaty, but in an agreement so binding that Sardinia could not afterwards free herself from it, that if a considerable part of Italy were transferred to the King of Sardinia, Savoy and Nice should be annexed to France for the security of her frontier. Well, the hon. Baronet says that we interfered too late. The first we heard of such a project was naturally, almost immediately (at most three weeks) after our coming into office, when the French Government said that they would not entertain this project if the Treaty of Villafranca was to be carried into effect, but they were of opinion that as that treaty had placed the King of Sardinia in possession of a great portion of Italy, then the security of France required that Savoy and Nice should be given up. We stated at once, in the beginning of July last, the mischievous effects such an annexation would produce. We believed it would have a mischievous effect; but we did not say then, we have never said, that we should oppose that annexation by force of arms. We informed the French Government that, in our opinion, a grave mistake in policy would be committed if these provinces were annexed to France. We pointed out that the distrust which would thereby be created in Europe, on the Rhine, and elsewhere, rendered the annexation in every way objectionable. That was the course we pursued and the opinion we maintained. It is an opinion we have never concealed from the Emperor of the French, or from any of the other Powers of Europe. But we never proposed to carry that protest to the extremity of war in the event of the annexation being carried out.

In considering the conduct of Sardinia and of the Italians, it must be borne in mind that the people of Italy have, not merely since 1815, but for hundreds of years, been suffering from the effect of their own dissensions. They have been subdued by foreign Powers, they have been kept in subjection to tyrants whom they have despised, they have been misgoverned to the utmost extent, their national genius has been silenced; and all these misfortunes have sprung from the same cause. It has been a reproach to them in the eyes of foreign nations, and one which they have felt deeply, that to their own disunion, dissensions, and jealousies they owed the miseries they suffered. Such being the case, what was more natural than that the men who wished that their country should be independent, and that she should play her part once more in the great theatre of the world, should apply the antidote where they found the poison at work, and attempt by union to remedy the disease from which their country languished? That was the feeling even in Tuscany, where there was no violent tyranny to complain of. The Government was mild, though no encouragement was given to political or even to literary exertion, and had it been only a question of driving away one Sovereign and putting another in his place the people would not have been disposed for revolution; but the feeling in Tuscany, as well as elsewhere, was that, unless they could have union and range themselves under the banner of a single Sovereign, there would be no chance of security and independence for them as a nation. The King of Sardinia is a brave and gallant man, a soldier who has distinguished himself in the field; but it is not so much his personal merits as his being the Sovereign who has evinced a desire to assert the independence of Italy which has rallied the Italians round him and induced them to unite themselves under his sceptre. It was the same feeling that induced the people of Italy to place themselves under the protection of France. What, then, was France to do in such a case? The Emperor of the French had signed a treaty by which the Dukes of Tuscany and Modena had their rights reserved to them; but he had declared at the same time that he would neither use force himself nor permit others to use it to coerce the will of the people of Italy. The Italians were encouraged by that declaration, and proclaimed that their wish was to be annexed to Sardinia. Austria, enfeebled by the war she had just passed through, and dispirited by the reverses she had sustained, although she still maintained her former views as to the rights which were derived from legitimate sovereignty and rights derived from treaties, agreed to make no attack on what she would call the revolted parts of Italy and to confine herself to the defence of her own dominions. What was the course, then, which Her Majesty's Government took? Seeing that the people of Italy had suffered from their former disunion, and from the foreign intervention which had taken place in 1821, in 1848, and on other occasions, they deemed that the time had now come when it was right to see whether the Italians could not form and sustain a Government for themselves. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, laid it down as a principle by which they would abide, that the Italians should be allowed to make their own choice of a Government and that no foreign Power should be interposed to coerce them. I could not gather the view of the hon. Baronet on this subject, but the view I have stated is a broad and simple view. We have found hitherto that the people of Italy who have rallied under the King of Sardinia have shown no disposition to break into tumult. There has been but one outrage, but one murder committed during the revolution in Central Italy, and nothing like anarchy has displayed itself there. On the contrary, there has everywhere been submission to the new form of Government, and the people have ranged themselves under the banner of order.

Lord John Russell

Well, then, I come to that which formed the theme of the greater part of the speech of the hon. Baronet—the case of Naples and Sicily. And here I must say I could have wished that the hon. Baronet had spared the memory of one who is now no more—Lord Minto. His representations of Lord Minto's conduct are entirely erroneous. Lord Minto went to Italy at the desire of my noble Friend, who was then Foreign Secretary, with the view of reconciling the Sovereigns of Italy to make reasonable and useful improvements, and of recommending the chief persons of the Liberal party to remain tranquil under their respective Sovereigns, and to look for internal improvement from those Sovereigns, rather than attempt revolution.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in explanation, said, I should be sorry to allow the noble Lord to remain for a moment under a misapprehension. I said that I had the most agreeable souvenir of the kindness and amiability with which Lord Minto treated me personally, but that his political mission was a failure; that the Government who sent him had deceived the Sicilian patriots. That was all I said,

I did not say a word against the personal character and conduct of Lord Minto.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The hon. Gentleman having represented certain facts, and having declared that Lord Minto was the instrument of deceiving the Sicilian patriots, it is necessary to state exactly what occurred with respect to Naples and Sicily. Lord Minto, when he went to Naples, found that the King had given a Constitution to his people and that a Liberal Ministry were in office. He assisted at a Council with the King of Naples that sat many hours, and the result of which was that certain concessions were made to the people of Sicily, which it was hoped would induce them to remain under the sceptre of the King of Naples. Lord Minto was authorized to make these proposals to the Sicilians; but when he arrived there two circumstances had occurred which contributed to the failure of his endeavours, both of which were beyond Lord Minto's control. One was, that the French revolution had broken out, and that the French people had proclaimed a republic. The minds of men were agitated throughout Europe, as we all remember, by that news. The people of Sicily among others were discontented with their former Government, and, wishing for a change, they began to think that some republican change would be more advantageous than the institutions they had formerly lived under, or than a return to the sway of the King of Naples. Another circumstance had occurred which I may relate, as so many circumstances of a similar character are known that it can be no additional reproach upon the late King of Naples to mention it. Lord Minto's only chance was in carrying these concessions with him as a British Minister, and recommending them in that capacity to the Sicilians as a sufficient guarantee for their liberty. But when he arrived in Sicily he found that these conditions had been known some days, and that they had been sent without any recommendation from the King of Naples. The people of Sicily had deliberated upon those proposals, and had determined to reject them, and thus his mission failed at the moment of his arrival.

Now let us see what have been our relations with respect to that Spanish branch of the House of Bourbon which now sits upon the throne of Naples. In 1806 the British Government refused to make peace with France almost solely because the Emperor of the French demanded Sicily, and the British Government to its honour refused to surrender the territory of an ally. Thus the house of Bourbon owed to the Government of Great Britain the preservation of Sicily. A constitution was at that time established in Sicily, which Lord William Bentinck did much to confirm. By that constitution the kingdom of Sicily was to be separated from the kingdom of Naples. If the eldest son of the King of the Two Sicilies chose Sicily he was to abandon the crown of Naples, while if he chose Naples he was to give up Sicily, and the second son was to succeed to the throne of that country. In 1814 the King of the Two Sicilies procured an article to be inserted in the Treaty of Vienna, in which he was recognized as King of the Two Sicilies, whereby the constitution of 1812 was torn to pieces and scattered to the winds. In 1815 the King of the Two Sicilies made a Treaty with Austria, by which he engaged not introduce into his dominions any other Government than that which the Emperor of Austria might think fit to introduce into Lombardy. By this Treaty he not only destroyed the constitution of 1812, but he made a compact with a Foreign Power that he would not restore liberty to Sicily. In 1821, when that country had a constitution, it was overthrown by the presence of a foreign force, and 40,000 Austrian troops were left to occupy Naples and Sicily, and I believe did occupy those countries for three or four years. In 1848, again, the King of Naples gave a constitution to his subjects, which he afterwards destroyed by his own hands. From 1848 to 1859 the people of Naples and Sicily suffered under—not the absolute Government of the monarch and the despotic conduct of his Ministers, but under an arbitrary and vexatious police, which made every man's house a prison, which tracked men as they walked the streets, and followed them into the privacy of domestic life, and which made the whole kingdom such a scene of misery and tyranny as has hardly any example. The present King succeeded to the throne. The late Government of this country thereupon sent Mr. Elliot to Naples, and told him verbally—for I believe he had no written instructions—to advise a liberal Prime Minister and a constitution to the King of Naples. When we succeeded to the Government we likewise advised the King to make concessions of popular institutions, and, above all, to establish a just administration of the law. The Ministers of the King of Naples said "We do not mean to grant a constitution; we disapprove of popular constitutions, but we mean to administer the law." Upon this we inquired, if they meant to administer the law, why they kept so many persons in prison against the law? They rejoined that the law was intended for the people, and not for the Government; that the Government might arrest anybody it pleased, and that it was necessary for the purposes of the State that the Government should not be compelled to bring them before the tribunals. Thus we went on, always advising concessions and a liberal constitution, or at the least an administration of the law, and if our advice has not been taken, and the concessions lately made have not succeeded, it only proves that those concessions were made too late. We at least cannot reproach ourselves that we have concealed from the King of Naples the policy that would have saved his throne and given security to his dynasty in future. Even a few months ago the King of Naples might have secured both Naples and Sicily. An expedition went out to Sicily—and here I must explain the particular fact to which the hon. Baronet alludes. He adverted to a speech made by me in this House in answer to the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer) relative to Garibaldi; but the hon. Baronet did not state, and probably did not know, the date when that occurrence took place. It took place in the summer of last year, when the King had just ascended the throne and had ascertained the existence of much discontent in Sicily, and when it was desirable he should take every opportunity of meeting this discontent by just concessions and the establishment of a free constitution in that island. The Government of Naples wished us to represent to Sardinia that it ought not to invade a friendly State. It so happened that the King of Sardinia had no such design or intention, and we received a communication to that effect. What happened lately took place without our knowledge. I know not whether it was without the knowledge of the Sardinian Government, but so far from their having inspired the expedition, my accounts all tell me that they looked upon it as a wild and mad enterprise, and thought they would soon receive intelligence of its utter failure. I have stated on former occasions, when Garibaldi was reproached with being a filibuster, that the name could not justly be applied to a man who had rescued a country from slavery, and placed it in a position of liberty and happiness. Garibaldi is, at least, a man of very extraordinary character. He landed with between 1,000 and 2,000 men, and in the course, I believe, of a fortnight, 18,000 or 20,000 of the forces of the King of Naples agreed to evacuate Palermo, and the people of Sicily followed him as their deliverer. Well, then, again comes a new position of affairs. It may be that the people of Sicily will declare in favour of annexation. It may be, and I think it likely, that an attempt to annex Sicily and then to annex Naples, and, I suppose, the Roman States, would not end in the consolidation of a firm Government. For my own part, I doubt very much whether the people of the north of Italy can, under the same sceptre with the people of southern Italy, form a firm and permanent Government, which would act in harmony for the welfare of the Peninsula. These are my doubts and my opinions. If the King of Naples is able by the concessions which he has made to conciliate the Neapolitans, and induce them to live under his rule with free institutions, Her Majesty's Government cannot find fault with such a result. Again, if the people of Sicily can obtain the constitution of 1812, and are satisfied with the constitution, it is not for us to find fault with the arrangement. But, on the other hand, we will never lose sight of the principle which we have before enunciated, and which we think is a sacred principle—one to which there are indeed some, but very rare, exceptions—namely, that with regard to the internal government of a country the people of that country are the best judges, and that no foreigner should interfere by force to coerce and to overwhelm their decision. It is not only a nice question, but it is one of the most extreme difficulty, for foreigners to declare, "Such a man is worthy of your confidence; such a Prince may be safely followed; such a chief is a good political adviser, such another will give you a constitution under which you may live happy." A foreigner should speak on such matters with great measure and with great reserve, and can only give an opinion according to the imperfect lights which he may possess. It is, therefore, for the people of Sicily and of Naples, and I must add also—whoever may be offended by that expression—it is for the people of the Roman States themselves to say what is the form of government under which they choose to live.

Sir Robert Peel

With regard to the policy of the British Government, we may from day to day have to treat of matters in which our relations with other Powers may induce us to recommend a particular measure at one time, or a certain course at another; but I can assure the House, and it is the only word and the last word I have to say, that, as far as concerns the people of Italy, we have no other policy than to leave them to decide for themselves their own fate. If their decision should be such as tends to the future happiness and independence of Italy, I feel confident we shall rejoice at it, and not on account of Italy alone, and I believe that for the liberty and happiness of Europe, as well as for “the balance of power” in Europe—a phrase which is often abused, but which yet has a clear and significant meaning—there can be no better guarantee and no greater security than the independence of Italy.

“Who values liberty confines

His love for her within no narrow bounds;

MR. KINGLAKE: It was, I think, quite unnecessary for my hon. Friend (Sir Robert Peel) to deprecate any possible opinion on the part of the House that his Motion would be in any way inopportune, for the attitude taken by Sardinia is certainly one well calculated to give great anxiety to every man who feels an interest in the maintenance of the peace of Europe. An aggression by any one European State is always a matter of deep importance, but the experience of the last few months has taught us that an aggression by Sardinia is an operation which draws with it very peculiar consequences. Sardinia, as we know, is a neighbour of France; and when Sardinia, going forth in quest of prey, succeeds in aggrandizing herself, it seems that the Emperor of the French instantly comes before Europe and claims to be indemnified for the additional strength which she has acquired. This is obviously a consideration which gives great importance to all such transactions as those which have lately occurred. Given, that Sardinia is to possess herself of the island of Sicily, we may then have to make out, according to some new Rule of Three, what country will be sufficiently rich to compensate the Emperor of the French for this aggrandizement of his neighbour. Is it Genoa which is to be given up? Rumour says so. That would be an acquisition by the Emperor of the French which would be vastly more than equivalent to the doubtful advantage expected by Sardinia in the annexation of Sicily. The Emperor's plan for the territorial re-arrangement of Europe seems to be to put forward another State to make claims for herself, and then to seek the kind of compensation I have suggested. My hon. Friend used an expression in speaking of the Austrian army in 1848 which was, I think, rather a slip of the tongue, and which probably he would be glad to have corrected. He talked about the Austrian army running away from Milan. It certainly did retire from the city at the time of the insurrection; but that very retirement was the beginning of a series of most masterly military operations which ended in a campaign, in the course of which Marshal Radetsky was able to roll back the tide of war, and to gain for himself, at the great age of 86, the just reputation of being—I will not say the first, because the Duke of Wellington was then alive—but the second commander in Europe. The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) has made to-night one statement which has given me most unfeigned satisfaction. He has told us that Count Rechberg, the enlightened Prime Minister of Austria, has at length announced his abandonment of that one unhappy line of policy which tended greatly to separate this country from her ancient ally. I rejoice that that cause of difference is now entirely removed. The noble Lord seemed inclined to excuse or palliate the peculiar position in which General Garibaldi is placed, by referring to the good which he seems able to do; and the noble Lord said that many a man might be called a filibuster who, in point of fact, was greatly benefiting a country. But I cannot feel that that is a satisfactory mode of explaining the position in which Garibaldi stands, for it seems to me that if there be any palliation for the kind of enterprise which he has undertaken, it lies in this—that he is one of a great people who aim at being a nation. It is in that light, and not because he is simply doing good, that his enterprise is viewed with approbation by so many Englishmen.

Lord John Russell

The question that is suggested to my mind by the Motion of my hon. Friend is this—is Sardinia a country truly independent—is she a country, I will not say lawfully, but honestly, labouring to put together the scattered members of Italy, or is she in point of fact the vassal—the mere vassal of France? Now, I regret to be obliged to come to the conclusion that the latter description is the true one. Up to March last no doubt it was possible to hope and believe that Sardinia was actually independent. At that time Count Cavour assured not only the Foreign Minister of his country, but also his own most intimate friends, that no consideration should induce him or the King he represented to sell or to surrender either Savoy or Nice, and yet within a fortnight from that time he was devising a scheme to secure the Treaty of Zurich. The only excuse for such a departure from a pledged word was, that he was acting under pressure; but, if so, why does he now claim to stand before Europe as the Minister of an independent State? I am free to admit that a Power of second-rate importance like Sardinia, placed under compulsion by a great Power like France, does demand our compassion, but it does not form a reason for our becoming the ally of a Power which confesses she has lost her independence. The ties which bound the King of Sardinia to the provinces of Savoy and Nice were most sacred. Those provinces had not only been from time immemorial a part of the sovereignty of his ancestors, but they were the territories which had given them rank as sovereign Princes in Europe. Not only from that circumstance, but also from the fact that his ancestor regained those provinces in 1814 under solemn pledges to retain them, was he bound to consider the ties sacred. We know that in 1814-15 those provinces were in the hands of the belligerent Powers, who were then bringing to a conclusion the war they had been waging against France. It was competent to those powers to dispose of those provinces as they pleased, and they thought fit to restore them to the King of Sardinia, an independent sovereign, in order that, being on the frontier of France, they might form a part of the system of the balance of power in Europe. They even advanced a large sum of money to the King of Sardinia to enable him to fortify those provinces against the very Power into whose hands the present King has thought fit to surrender them. The King of Sardinia has parted with the ancient possessions of his family, he has given up his military frontier—he has lost the best battalions of his army—he has abandoned a great portion of his seaboard, in order that he might preside, or seem to preside, over the great endeavours now being made to reconstruct the kingdom of Italy. I admit that the hope of attaining such an object might well excite a manly ambition; but I think that the abdication of a part of his own territories was but a sorry step towards that end. In the position which Sardinia occupied in Europe it was the duty of the King to cultivate the friendship of France, of Austria, and of England; but he has so acted that he has no other ally than France, if that country can be called an ally, which is, in fact, his master. When he awakes from the dream for which he has abandoned so much he will find his position is like that of King Joseph or King Jerome, who had territories assigned to them, but whose dominion was merely nominal, and whose kingdoms soon disappeared. For the sake of Italy, Sardinia has been pardoned much, but let her beware how she so operates in Italy as that her conduct may have an influence on the affairs of Central Europe. It is obviously possible for Sardinia so to operate with her troops on the Mincio as to be able to influence events upon the Rhine. I happen to know that Count Cavour announced a policy of this kind in March last. He then deliberately stated that Sardinia was looking to the possession of Venetia, but her first duty would be to keep Austria in check on the Mincio while the Emperor acted on the Rhine. It is one thing that Europe should assent to Sardinia extending herself in Italy, but it is another thing to assent to her using the power gained in Italy to influence events in Central Europe. We must never forget that the great “Quadrilateral,” of which Verona is a part, is a barrier or rampart for Germany. The policy of which the King of Sardinia has consented to be the instrument has been suggested to another Potentate. It is well known that since 1857 the French Government has pressed upon the Prince of Prussia the idea of his taking some of the minor States of Germany and giving up to France, as compensation, the Rhenish provinces. To obtain that object was, I believe, the hope of the Emperor when he went the other day to Baden; but he found there an insuperable difficulty—he found there an honest man. It would, indeed, hardly have been possible for the Prince of Prussia to act otherwise than his honourable, straightforward nature, dictated on that occasion, for he was in possession of a fact which I will mention to the House, and can do so with perfect confidence on its accuracy. The House will do me the justice to remember that I have on former occasions ventured to make statements which I think time has shown to be accurate, and therefore the House may feel inclined to believe the fact which I am about to state. I assert this, and it is a fact of deep importance for those who still retain the idea that the Emperor of the French is the sincere champion of Italy. I assert that at the second meeting at Villafranca the Emperor of the French proposed to the Emperor Francis Joseph to give him back Lombardy upon condition that Austria should acquiesce in operations which he then intended to attempt on the Rhine. I repeat that the Prince of Prussia was in possession of this fact, and it is not to be wondered at that he met the proposal of the Emperor in the same spirit of straightforward honesty as inspired the answer of the Emperor Francis Joseph. That answer was very short and very simple. He said, "No, I am a German Prince!"

Now, Sir, I believe that even if the German Princes were not so high minded, if they were to waver on this subject, the feeling of the people of Germany is of such a kind that they would be compelled to do their duty. In Germany, although there are differences on a thousand subjects, there is one subject on which all are united. You can always secure the concurrence of every German around you when you say that the French shall never have the German Rhine. In truth, the Germans seem to have determined that they will not again go through the humiliations and disasters which they suffered in the early part of this century, but they will begin with that noble uprising of the people which characterized the close of the last war—they will begin with the year 1813. But even if the people of Germany had forgotten the disasters to which they were exposed by French invasion, her Princes could not be ignorant of modern history, as to the manner in which a Bonapartean Sovereign is accustomed to make peace. From the Peace of Campo Formio, in 1796, down to the Peace of Villafranca, in the last year, you always find this to be the characteristic mark of the Bonapartean mode of making peace—that they make a peace not on the terms merely of arranging the relations of the two belligerents, but on the plan of deliberately sacrificing the interests of neutrals and friends. So it was at Villafranca. The scheme of the Emperor of the French was to make peace with the Emperor of Austria by delivering up to him Lombardy, and to induce him to accept it as the price of treachery on his part against her German confederates. Well, now, I ask, why is it that, from one end of Europe to the other, we have nothing but rumours of war? France has no quarrel that I know of—no dispute, even, with Belgium or with Prussia, or with the Mecklenburg, or Saxony, or Denmark, or Bavaria, or Sardinia; and yet there is not one of these States whose territories are not in some way threatened by the rumours now prevailing in Europe. It is notorious that along the whole eastern frontier of France agitators are at work endeavouring to sow the seeds of discontent, and prepare the minds of the people for a change of the rule under which they live. I have seen a letter from a gentleman of high character, whose name I will mention confidentially to any hon. Gentleman who is accustomed to take part in these debates, though I do not think it would be right to mention it publicly—I have seen a letter from a gentleman residing in one of the States thus threatened, and he gives an account of an interview which had taken place between him and one of those French emissaries, a passage from which I will quote as somewhat interesting to the House. The emissary says to him,

Mr. Kinglake

"There is not a country which France does not hold in her hand, not a country without some internal question on which it is possible to found a strong and immediate action. In Prussia and Denmark, the hostility of the small States; in Austria, Hungary; in Russia, serfage; in England—in England—"

[The hon. Gentleman here paused significantly, during which an hon. Member called out "Ireland! Ireland!"] The House seems surprised when I pause at the mention of England, but the truth is this emissary, as the ground on which the French Government founded their hopes as regards this country, had mentioned the name of an hon. Gentleman, a Member of this House—[Cries of "Name!"] —and as he is not present it would perhaps be right to abstain from naming him. It is unnecessary to say that the French emissary did not at all mean that the Member to whom he referred was engaged in any sort of intrigue that would bring upon him any kind of blame; all that was meant was that the policy pursued by that hon. Member was of such a kind as to give great reliance and gratification to the Emperor of the French.

Well, I ask, why is Europe thus disturbed? I say the answer lies in the internal state of France. The internal state of France is such that it becomes absolutely necessary for the ruler of that country to divert attention from home affairs by giving to the people of France the habit of looking abroad. We most of us know that M. Paradol is now lying in prison for having written what in most countries would be considered a very moderate pamphlet; and the passage for which he was thrown into prison is one in which he expressed what I believe is the feeling of many Frenchmen—a yearning for peace on their part, a desire to turn their attention to home affairs, and give up this habit of causing disturbance in the neighbouring States. The passage for which M. Paradol was prosecuted is this—

“France is like a man standing at a window, and so utterly engrossed by what is passing in the street, that he cannot be induced to mind what is going on in his own house.”

Well, now, it is in order to make it possible to keep a man in prison for writing words like these that Europe is disturbed by wars or rumours of wars, or some miserable annexation of territory undertaken by the French Emperor. Among the statesmen and orators of France there used to be something which was called a foreign policy; but now there seems to be no more a foreign policy, but a mere series of small conspiracies. The foreign policy of France has degenerated into a mere system for the disturbance of neighbouring States. The kind of agitation now being carried on over the whole eastern frontier of France, may substantially and truly be said to be the operation, not of the French Foreign Office, but of the French police. Was there ever a more singular spectacle than that now presented? Here is France possessed with an idea that there is to be speedily a war with some Power—and yet, so singularly situated is she as not to know with whom she was to fight. France, as it seems to me, is, as it were, led forward like some mere dumb animal that has been taught to pull a trigger and fire a musket, without knowing why or wherefore, except that she was under the orders of her master. Our own foreign policy is at present in a somewhat labyrinthine state, but for this labyrinth there is an effectual clue, and that is one which the words of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs himself gave us on the 26th of March, words which delighted every section of the House, and which have been responded to throughout the country. After stating his wish to live on the most friendly terms with the Government of France, he went on to say—

“We ought not to keep ourselves apart from the other nations of Europe, but when future questions arise—as future questions may arise—we should be ready to act with others.”

Sir, I consider that these assuring words contain a true indication of the policy which England ought to pursue.

MR. WHITESIDE: I wish to call the attention of the House to the practical part of this subject. The hon. Baronet opposite put a question to the noble Lord, to which I was not so fortunate as to hear the answer. He asked for information as to the probable demands of France in the event of the annexation of Sicily to the Kingdom of Sardinia. No doubt, as the noble Lord truly observed, delicacy and reserve ought to be observed in respect to a future foreign policy, when you are ignorant of what that policy may be and have no knowledge of the facts. But the noble Lord gave no answer to the direct question put to him. He, however, made a statement full of interest, and I only regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not here at the time to be instructed by it. It was declared some months since in this House—although it was not then admitted by the Treasury Bench—that long ago a bargain was struck between the Minister of Sardinia and the French Emperor, that in the event of the Kingdom of Sardinia being considerably enlarged compensation should be made to the injured and terrified ruler of France. The noble Lord, however, is the first Minister of the Crown who has acknowledged the truth of this statement, and he has truly added that this policy of the French Government was calculated to disturb Germany and fill Europe with distrust, and that that opinion was conveyed by our Minister to the Government of the Emperor. That I hold to be a very important announcement. It is an announcement of the view which Her Majesty's Government took of that transaction. But I beg the House to remember that, while the noble Foreign Secretary has made that significant statement as to the recent policy of France, we have had the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer announcing to us for weeks and months past, with his extraordinary powers of eloquence, that nothing but peace and happiness were to flow from our commercial arrangements with that country the policy of which the noble Lord tells us fills Europe with alarm and distrust. Which of these two Ministers is in the right I do not pretend to say, except to hint as delicately as I can that I think it is the noble Foreign Secretary, and not his right hon. Colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As, however, the noble Lord has expressed his opinion, it is only fair that the right hon. Gentleman should have an opportunity of favouring us with the opposite view of the question, and of depicting the general confidence and tranquillity consequent upon the conclusion of the French Commercial Treaty. I agree with the noble Lord that a policy of peace, to be pursued, I presume, consistently with honour, is the policy worthy of a British Minister. I was not in this House when the discussion took place upon the conduct of Lord Minto; but I have read what was said on that occasion, and I learnt that the noble Viscount defended that noble Lord from attacks then made upon him, as I understand, by certain Members of his present Administration. It is a remarkable circumstance that the hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) should commend the patriotic spirit displayed by the Volunteers of this country, and that the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Kinglake) should tell us that Europe is disturbed by rumours of war, changes of dynasty, and possible revolutions; while for months past we have been assured by the most eloquent Members of the Ministry that if we only acquiesced in his schemes we might calculate upon a secure and prolonged European peace.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL explained that the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly right in saying he had declined giving the information referred to in this Motion, which he felt it his duty to oppose.

MR. MONSELL said, that he could not collect from the noble Lord's speech whether Her Majesty's Government were encouraging or discouraging the annexation of Sicily to Sardinia. If the inquiry addressed to the noble Lord had been whether the Government were in favour of leaving the people of Sicily to choose for themselves what form of domestic Government they would live under, the noble Lord's speech would have been perfectly satisfactory, and everybody present might have concurred in it. That, however, was not the question put by his hon. Friend, who wished to know whether the policy of an-nexing Sicily to Sardinia was to be pursued, and whether the consent of Her Majesty's Government was again to be given to principles which must lead to continual changes in the map of Europe, putting every small State in perpetual trepidation lest it should be transferred to some other Power. In the neighbourhood of the Rhine the question was perpetually asked, were the provinces to continue to belong to themselves, or were they to be annexed to some other power! Of all questions that came before the House, this was the most important. Undoubtedly the principle was sanctioned in the first instance by our Government in regard to Northern Italy. Take, for example, the case of Parma. Nobody pretended that there was the slightest cause of complaint against the Government of that Duchy, where justice was equally administered, and the Sovereign trusted and beloved by her subjects, on whom she had conferred innumerable benefits. Yet, merely to gratify the ambition of a neighbouring Power she was driven from her throne and her dominions annexed. The Emperor of the French, as Count Cavour had distinctly stated, following the example set in the annexation of Parma, Tuscany, and Modena, proceeded to apply the same principle to Savoy and Nice, where nobody supposed that the favour of "universal suffrage" adopted expressed the real opinions of the people. Let the same system be followed in Belgium. Suppose a bad harvest, a dearth of employment for the manufacturers, and great consequent discontent to exist in that country,—what would be more easy, under such circumstances, than for French gold and active French emissaries to get up some kind of a popular demonstration, and thus to bring on a repetition of the transactions lately witnessed in Parma or in Nice? Again, take the Christian provinces of Turkey. No doubt the majority of the House would be glad to hear that those provinces had vindicated their freedom. It was, however, a totally different question whether we could sanction their annexation to Russia. But if we did not choose to sanction it, would not every logical ground of resistance to such an annexation have been cut from under our feet by our conduct in regard to the Italian States? This was a matter on which the whole peace and tranquillity of Europe depended. The principle upon which he was animadverting had never before been recognized by this country. It was violated in the case of Cracow by Austria, whose proceedings were denounced in the memorable debates which took place on the subject in that House. It was opposed to the doctrines laid down by Sir James Mackintosh, in his remarkable speech on the annexation of Genoa to Sardinia, in which that eminent man declared that the great idea of a Christian commonwealth of nations was that every small State should be as much secured against the aggression of a large State as every private individual in a well-governed community was secured against the aggression of his neighbour. That was the only true principle; the setting up of any other would overturn the foundations of international law, bring back a heathen sentiment instead of a Christian one, and substitute for the dictates of right and justice the motto of the proudest of the ancient Irish chieftains—"the strongest hand uppermost."

Mr. Whiteside

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he thought the hon. Baronet opposite, led away by his laudable feelings in favour of the liberties of one country, had rather overlooked the rights and interests of another. It would be most unfair, because of their natural indignation at the recent transactions connected with Savoy and Nice, to visit the sins of Sardinia and France upon the people of Sicily and the rest of Italy. The transfer of Savoy and Nice to France was attributable to Count Cavour and to him only, and he must be responsible for it to his country and to posterity. In his opinion the feeling in Sardinia was so much opposed to France that the extension of that kingdom and the formation of an united Italy would rather counteract than advance French views. The noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office had only erred in one respect in regard to these transactions. Dazzled by the light of the Commercial Treaty, he and his colleagues had turned a blind eye upon the proceedings of France towards Sardinia, and had given delusive and evasive answers in the other House of Parliament; but since the period at which that annexation took place, nothing could be more suitable than the terms in which the noble Lord had expressed the policy of this country.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY begged to call attention to the very broad political doctrine laid down by the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs—a doctrine that might increase in importance before long—that people were to be allowed to choose their own Governments. The noble Lord apologised to Roman Catholic Members for suggesting that they might also apply the doctrine to the Roman States, but he (Mr. Scully) took no offence, because he felt that the noble Lord must have been laughing at them in his sleeve when he talked of such a doctrine as that. Would the noble Lord or his Government apply it to India? Would the noble Lord or the Government direct their Minister to ascertain by the votes of the people of India whether they would have England as their ruler? All he (Mr. Scully) could say was, that England did not act upon or tolerate that doctrine, and never would act upon it. He believed that the principle of allowing the people to decide for themselves who should govern them might be safely applied to Ireland. [A laugh.] At all events, no man who had a shilling to lose would vote for annexation to France, though the fact of pamphlets on the subject being published simultaneously in Paris and Dublin showed that there were people infatuated enough to pay attention to it; but would the Government apply the doctrine to Ireland? He believed not. He would not defend the late or the present King of Naples, but no doubt it was difficult for the people of England to understand the position of the Neapoliton Government. So with respect to the Sovereign of the Roman States, who he supposed all would allow was a most beneficent ruler; he was not disliked by the Roman people, but beset by a host of foreign rabble. He had never himself, so far as he was aware, entertained an illiberal sentiment or given an illiberal vote; but he did not like to hear noble Lords propounding sham doctrines for the purpose of gaining a little clap-trap applause, when everybody knew that England never had acted, and never would act, upon them.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

PAPER DUTY REPEAL BILL.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he rose to move

"That this House, in consequence of the House of Lords having interfered with the arrangement of Supplies for the year, recommended by Her Majesty's advisers, and by such interference assumed responsibility for the conduct of finance, postpones the consideration of further proposals by the Ministers of the Crown towards meeting public expenses until the period when the authority of the House of Commons shall have been asserted, and the Bill for the repeal of the Excise on Paper shall have become law."

MR. SPEAKER stated that, one Amendment upon the Motion for going into Committee of Supply having been put and negatived, it would be contrary to the rules of the House to propose another.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he understood that the forms of the House would not allow of a second Motion being made on the proposal to go into Committee; but he wished to call attention to the subject of his intended Motion. He had refused to have anything to do with the Resolutions which the Government proposed to the House on the conduct of the Peers, believing them to be unworthy of the occasion. He held it to be the duty of the House not to be satisfied with mere words, but to take some active step beyond the passing of an abstract Resolution, which did not meet the case. In his opinion, the House had placed itself in a very degraded position, and lowered its authority in the eyes of the country. Take the case of a gentleman whose estate was claimed by a person having no legal title: would not the proper course for him to adopt be to defend his rights in a Court of Justice? But suppose he called his tenantry together, and then proposed and carried a resolution that his title was perfectly good, and that there was no danger in future of his position being attacked, and that if it should be he had the means of defeating the aggression. What would be thought of this? Would not the credit of his title sink in the estimation of his neighbours? But such was the position in which the House of Commons stood. Resolutions had been passed which were totally unnecessary, unless something had taken place which was deserving of censure; and if so, other steps were equally called for. It was not a question as to whether the paper duties was the best tax to repeal—and he frankly admitted that he was himself disposed to concur with those who thought that the abolition of the tea and sugar duties would have been more satisfactory to the largest number of people; but the House of Commons thought that on various accounts it was best that the paper tax should be taken off at this time, and consequently the noble individuals in “another place” were bound, according to constitutional usages, to accept the conclusion at which the Commons had arrived. Suppose an hon. Member of that House were the owner of a ship, to which he appointed a captain, and that in the course of its voyage it got near the rocks and in the midst of dangers, and that the captain was about to take in a sail when the owner ordered it to remain set, would not the owner from that moment have the charge of the vessel, and be responsible for its fate? That was precisely the position which noble Lords had taken in reference to one of the provisions of the Budget; and they were, therefore, responsible for the whole. Consequently, it would seem that in future the Lords were to have a control over the finances of the country. If so, he believed the House had a good case for postponing the consideration of Supply until the authority of the Commons should have been asserted, and the Bill for the repeal of the excise on paper should have become law. It was a good opportunity for warning the Lords that if they persisted in their present course of resisting popular measures passed by the Commons, the time would soon come when the people would discuss, in a different spirit than at present, the question of privilege, and it might become an important question whether we should not do well to substitute an elective for an hereditary peerage. Knowing, however, the value of the time of the House at that period of the Session, he would not now prolong his observations on the subject, which was, nevertheless, one of deep and urgent importance.

Sir John Trelawny

THE CHINA VOTE—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that though he was prevented by the rules of the House from moving the Amendment of which he had given notice, still he must express a hope that the House would require Estimates of the expenditure for the China operations to be produced in detail, for a portion of the money had been already spent. This Vote of £3,800,000 was called a Vote of Credit, and yet £443,000 had been spent in payment of outstanding debt. This was an important matter, because by such a proceeding the functions of that House in matters of expenditure might be defeated. The best way to extend the privileges of the House was to show a just jealousy of expenditure; but, unfortunately, in the present Session, before deciding what the expenditure was to be, the House had dealt with taxation in a very rough way, making marvellous changes in various directions. In calculating the expenditure for the year at £70,100,000, it was quite clear, from the present Estimate, without saying anything of the sum that might be required for the defence of the kingdom, that that calculation was wrong to the extent of nearly £3,800,000. The sum of £443,000 to which he had alluded had no business in the present Estimate, for it had reference to a China war long gone by, and must be the settlement of an old account. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer knew of this outstanding debt when he was estimating his surplus for the year at £500,000, it was a matter that ought to have been mentioned. The House ought to know what portion of the present Estimate had been spent, and how it had been spent, for it was impossible that there could be an audit unless an appropriation was made. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would give some explanation on this head, for if he found in Committee that the Estimate was not more satisfactory to him than it was at present, he should move that the Chairman report progress.

GENERAL PEELE said, he little thought that the statement he made on the 19th of March with respect to the Army Estimates, and the insufficiency of the money voted for the expense of the China war, would so soon have been verified by the facts. He then stated that the sum of £500,000 would be far from meeting the excess of expenditure over the Army Estimates for 1859, and that at least £500,000 more would be required. He also stated that it would require ten times the amount then asked for to defray the excess of expenditure on the China war. He showed that the excess on five Votes depending on the number of men, would more than absorb the whole of the money in the Vote of Credit assigned for the excess on the whole of the army expenditure. What he now wished to know was, whether one single shilling of the sum of money voted to meet the expense of the China war, had been paid to the Indian Treasury. It must be recollected that the whole of the expenditure connected with the Chinese war, had taken place in India. The munitions of war and the transport for the troops were taken up in India at, he believed, prices so exorbitant, that this Vote alone would require nearly the whole of the £500,000. The whole of the Native troops, moreover, employed in the Chinese expedition, were chargeable on that Vote of Credit, not a shilling having been taken for them in the Estimates of last year. They were raised in India; and he himself had seen the Order in Council, which declared that, from the moment they volunteered for service in China, they were to receive half batta and additional allowances. It was evident that those men became from the same moment chargeable to the British, and not to the Indian, Establishment. It could not be expected that the Indian revenue was to maintain troops which were going to do duty in China; nay, more, the Government must pay for their transport to the scene of operations. With that portion of the force which was drawn from Her Majesty's army the case was different, and an arrangement had been made that, instead of sending the regiments to England, as they were bound to do, the Indian Establishment should defray the expense of their transit to China, which was about equal in amount. They were under no such obligation, however, with respect to the Native troops; the whole expense of which must consequently be chargeable either on the £500,000 voted last year, or on the like sum which had this year been granted to defray the cost of the Chinese war. It was impossible to disconnect the army expenses from the Budget. The Budget represented and included—at least it professed to cover—the whole expense of the country, including that of the Chinese war. If it did not do so, it was, to use the expression of the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, “a gigantic delusion”—and he had no hesitation in saying the repeal of the paper duties was obtained under false pretences. He knew it might be urged that it was impossible to give estimates for prospective charges. He had never asked for any such estimate. All he had asked the Government to do was, to find means to meet the liabilities they had entered into; and that certainly might be fairly expected at their hands. Although evidence had been lately given before the Organization Committee as to the laxity of the accounts between the Indian Government and the Treasury, it was still hardly possible to believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Treasury were not aware that the expenses of the Chinese war were to become chargeable in the course of the present year. To believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not prepared for this charge of £400,000, when he brought forward his Budget, required an exercise of that charity, “which believeth all things, and comprehendeth all things.” The laxity of which he had spoken was not visible merely in the estimates for the Chinese war, but existed equally in those for the present year. On the 27th of February he had pointed out that there were charged on the Indian revenue for the present financial year 92,500 men, for whom it was perfectly preposterous to suppose that the Indian Government would pay. These 92,500 men were entirely independent of those troops who were going to China, and who, according to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of State for War, were already transferred to the British establishment. It was, therefore, evident that this excess of men must become chargeable on the Estimates of the present year. He did not wish to make any charge against his right hon. Friend; but within a month after these Estimates were laid on the table they were withdrawn, and subsequently to the passing of the Budget the revised Estimates were produced. The additional sum which it became necessary to take in those corrected Estimates for pay and allowances was met by a reduction in the other Votes. That reduction, however, consisted, not in a diminution of expenditure, but in the postponement of services till next year, which he believed it would have been found vastly better to perform in the present. For instance, £80,000 had been taken from the carriage department at Woolwich, though it was notorious that if there was any one department more than another in arrear at the present moment, it was the carriage department at Woolwich. Why, it was in evidence that at this instant there were a number of guns which could not be issued till their carriages were completed. He made no complaint of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War; it was necessary that he should make his Estimates square with the sum which had been introduced into the Budget. He repeated the protest which he had before uttered against introducing the Budget before the Estimates for the year were laid upon the table; he believed that the statement thereby presented was delusive, and that, by giving a false colour to the sum actually required, the service of the country was prejudicially affected.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he found that by the forms of the House he should be unable to move the Motion of which he had given notice, and which was to this effect, that, in order to remove one great obstacle to peace with China, the British Plenipotentiary be instructed not to insist on the fulfilment of the third article of the treaty of Tien-tain, by which his Majesty the Emperor of China agrees that the ambassador, minister, or other diplomatic agent appointed by her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain may reside, with his family and establishment, permanently at the capital, or may visit it occasionally, at the option of the British Government. He should, however, move it on the first Supply night. He should do so, not merely to raise a discussion, but because he considered that if it was agreed to that would go far to promote peace with China. At all events he thought that if the third article of the treaty was insisted on there was great danger that any peace we might make with China would not be of long duration.

General Peel

MR. WARNER said, the war in which we were now engaged with China was not one in which the House of Commons could be supposed to take an interest, for it was carried on by the Ministers of the Crown in defiance of a deliberate vote of the House of Commons, which had never been reversed. They had heard of an aggression by the House of Peers; but this was an aggression of far greater moment to the interests of the House. An opportunity ought to be taken of putting on record the sentiments of the House with respect to the manner in which the war had been commenced. As it had been undertaken, he hoped it might be attended with success; but he could scarcely hope for any very good results, and he trusted Her Majesty's Government would take advantage of any opportunity that might arise for coming to an amicable arrangement with the rulers of the Chinese Empire. It would, no doubt, be easy, with the resources at our command, to put down the brutal despotism which there prevailed, but the anarchy which would ensue might prove even worse. If results equally beneficial might be expected from our interference in China as in India, all would be well; but he looked forward with apprehension to the result of the pending conflict.

Main Question put,

The House divided:—Ayes 198; Noes 13: Majority 185.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.—OPERATIONS IN CHINA.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Sir, at this late hour (half-past ten), I will endeavour to make the statement which it is my duty to lay before the House as concise as I can consistently with the explanation which I have to give of the Vote of Credit which has been laid on the table of the House. But before I do so perhaps I may be allowed to take some notice of the observations which have been made by my right hon. and gallant Friend opposite (General Peel). The gallant General says that he prophesied that five times £500,000 would be requisite to make up the deficiency between the Estimates and the expenditure for last year, and for the China war generally, and he asks me whether every sixpence of the £500,000 which we took has not been expended in making up the deficiency on the ordinary Estimates of last year? In the first place I have to reply that not one sixpence of that sum was applicable to making up any deficiency which might have occurred in the ordinary Estimates of last year. My gallant Friend, who is well acquainted with these matters, must have spoken without reflection, for he must have known that you cannot apply one farthing of a Vote of Credit to any purpose but that for which it was voted. You cannot spend it in making up an ordinary deficiency in the ordinary Estimate of the year. If his vaticinations, therefore, should prove correct, which I trust they will not, the deficiency will have to be made up by a Vote next year, specially taken to cover it. But so far from all that sum being spent in that way, we have reason to believe that a large portion of it still remains unexpended. We cannot tell yet—until we receive accounts from China it is difficult to say how much of that money has been spent. Some of the regiments embarked later than we thought they would, and rather than being all spent, I should say that there was a surplus left on that Vote. The gallant General also says that he pointed out that we were quite wrong in our Estimate for the Chinese war, that £850,000 followed by £500,000 would be quite insufficient, that the war would inevitably come on, and that the Indian Government—and here he was right—would inevitably send home many more troops than we had expected, and he blames us for not having had the foresight to provide for this. Nobody knows better than the right hon. and gallant Gentleman how much safer it is not to trust to private or anything but official information. We have reason to recollect the circumstances in which we were placed in the last autumn.

The state of India was anything but satisfactory; nothing but gloom pervaded European society in India; and Earl Canning then said, in answer to letters from myself, that he could not part with European troops, and he could not say how soon a state of circumstances would arrive which would justify him in parting with any great number of European troops. We listened to that statement—we framed an estimate upon it. Great changes, however, for the better took place in India. The Punjaub had been quieted; the pacification of Oude seemed complete, and in consequence six battalions were promised from India, which induced us to withdraw the Estimate and to produce a revised Estimate. I will not go into detail upon the subject, but pass on to the observations of the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby). And there I must confess that to some great extent I agree with him. But when he says that the Estimate is unsatisfactory, I am surprised that it is not to the amount that he takes exception—which I confess is unsatisfactory—but rather to the manner and the time of proposing it. He says it is not made in the shape we like or at the moment we like. He is silent as to the amount, and I trust that he will derive some consolation from the extent of the Estimate which is laid before the House. In the Committee upstairs, of which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) was chairman, we took a great deal of evidence with regard to the state of the account pending between this country and India, and it was shown to be extremely unsatisfactory. I will read just a passage from the Report, because I wish to show the principle upon which the Government have acted in applying for this Vote of Credit.

“The state of the account between the British Exchequer and Indian territory is most unsatisfactory. The account for the Persian expedition is not yet closed. The account of the first China war is hardly completed yet. The account of the second China war, which ended in 1856, is not yet balanced. There are four or five different accounts still open, with disputed balances to a large amount; and with respect to the new expedition to China, India, in the midst of the great financial difficulties, has been required to make advances in the current year for all expenses incurred in taking up transports in India, in paying the men, and in providing cattle, horses, and other necessities, as well as equipments for the army. There does not appear to be any estimate of the amount of these advances, but, while Indian territory is overwhelmed with debt, it will be unseemly that Great Britain should make war on China out of Indian resources.

The repayment of these advances ought to be prompt, and within the present financial year."

I entirely concur in every sentence in that passage of the Report. This first Estimate of 443,896 for past transactions, which I will explain in a moment, is a sum for which I am at any rate not in any way responsible. It is an arrear owing to the East India Company. The accounts have not been audited. The amount has not been entirely agreed upon, but, as the East India Company are not so rich that they can overlook these little debts, and as they are anxious we should pay them, it is necessary to pay something to them on account of these past transactions. Would it be seemly this year to make war on Indian resources? I think not. I think it is wise and right that we should lay before the House of Commons, as far as we can form—I will not call it an estimate, but a guess of what possibly may be the amount required to repay the Indian Government, and to pay the army and navy engaged in these operations. The hon. Baronet says, "But you should give us this estimate in detail." I do not think it is possible to give that estimate in detail. I asked the East Indian Government to send me, not an account of the sums already expended for providing and equipping the expedition, but an estimate of the sums so expended, not however in detail, because they do not know the exact sums. They refused to send the information officially, upon the ground that they ought not to send officially anything pretending to be an account which, after all, was only an estimate of an account. I accepted that which they would give unofficially, because I thought it very important that the Government should lay before the House a rough and approximate estimate of what the cost may be. I think it better to dispense with accuracy rather than follow the system which has hitherto prevailed, of first spending the money, saying nothing to Parliament, and after all the transactions are ended coming to Parliament to make good a deficiency over which they have no possible check or control.

I will not weary the Committee by citing precedents, but I have carefully examined the precedents of the Votes for the China wars (that is, the first and second expeditions), of the Votes for the Caffre wars and the Crimean war, and in every case I find a lump sum presented to the House and voted as a Vote of Credit without details. The reason is obvious. You cannot foresee in a particular war what the expenditure will be. You have in your estimates the actual cost of the pay of the men and the cost of their keep. You may put an approximate estimate of what it will be when the men are on Indian allowances as well as English; you may put an approximate estimate of the cost of Indian Native troops, but you cannot make an estimate of the cost of the followers attached to these regiments. Therefore, if I were to depart from the precedent of putting the Estimate in a lump sum, I should depart from it for the purpose of laying before the House an estimate which would be illusory, and one which would deceive the House as to the sums which they were voting. What is the use of laying items before the House? Obviously that the House may exercise its discretion, and accept them or not—that they may put their finger on one item and say this is too much—you have too many troops, too many camp followers, too many coolies. Then it turns out in practice that they are much less—that the excess of expenditure is under some other head—and thus the interference becomes as illusory as the subject to which it is applied. I may really say that the very term "vote of credit" shows what is intended. It is not an estimate—not sums of money approved by the House of Commons—but a Vote given in confidence to the Government that they will spend it for purposes which are requisite, to the best of their ability. And I do not believe we could carry on war otherwise, unless we chose to accept knowingly, and with our eyes open, delusive Estimates, delusive criticisms, and delusive Votes. I have in this case so far departed from precedent that, instead of voting for the past, I am asking you to vote for the future. According to practice, I might have called upon the Committee to vote £400,000 or £500,000, after peace has been made and broken and there is a fresh war, but I think it much better to put the whole expenditure as estimated before the House of Commons. Let us face it at once and see what will be the cost in the course of the year, and should circumstances fortunately occur which would lead to an early termination of these unhappy hostilities, we shall have so much to the good. Probably the Committee will not be afraid, as the money cannot be applied to any other purpose, and it will be very fortunate if the money be not applied to this.

Mr. Sidney Herbert

First, I ought to state what are the sums of which the items of £443,896 for past transactions are composed. In the last China war there was an arrangement between the Treasury and the East India Company that the Company should bear all the ordinary charges of the force sent in aid of the expedition, but that they should be reimbursed by the Imperial Government all extraordinary payments. The accounts were settled a few years ago, up to 1847-48. We have still the balance remaining unsettled, from 1848-49 to 1858-59, of £281,000, upon which questions will arise. We have £82,000 on account of Indian military forces stationed in China, and about £80,000 the estimated cost of Indian Native troops which form part of the garrison of Canton. The great evil of the system, to my mind, is, that in point of fact you have no power over the Executive as to the number of troops you employ. You can vote every man under the Mutiny Act, and not a man more can be employed as long as you do not vote more money for their pay; but if you employ Indian troops you have no check on the amount, except in the gross sum which you are afterwards called upon to pay. No doubt this has been a very wrong system, and part of this sum, no less than £82,000, is for the cost of troops at Canton in the time of the gallant Officer opposite, and £80,000 is for the continuance of the garrison of Hong Kong up to the time this war broke out. The present Estimate, therefore, applicable to the war, in which, I believe unhappily we are now engaged, is less than £3,800,000 by £443,896, which sum applies to past transactions.

The Committee would probably like to know the sums directly or indirectly voted for the China expedition. In enumerating them I will follow the form of the Returns moved for by my right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), who asks what are the sums put upon the ordinary Army and Navy Estimates for 1860-61, which are applicable to the operations in China. Now, I believe that practically, except in the large consumption of stores, and the transport, the men are not necessarily an increased charge on the country for that expedition. We have, for instance, nine battalions of infantry in China; but, if there were no Chinese war, one or two battalions will be doing garrison duty abroad, and the other seven would be in England, where they would be useful enough. In the same way there would have been no considerable disbandment of seamen in our navy had there been no war. I will, however, give the information the hon. Baronet requires. The items in the Army Estimates for 1860-61 applicable to the China expedition were as follows:—Cost of forces of all ranks, £399,588; clothing and necessaries, £42,500, provisions, forage, fuel, light, &c., £22,740—total, £464,828. The Navy Estimates for 1860-61 included the following sums:—Hire of transports, £107,000; coals, £76,000; freight of stores, £17,000; making, with provisions, bedding, &c., £217,900; adding the pay of men in China (£463,000) it gave a total of £680,900. These two totals in items in the Army and Navy Estimates together made £1,145,728. Of the Vote of Credit taken last year to the amount of £850,000, the total apportioned for the army was £578,648, and for the navy £268,452. These amounts, together with the Vote of Credit for £500,000, give a grand total of about £2,500,000. We now come to the Vote before us. I have already explained that the sum of £443,896 in arrear due to Her Majesty's Government from the East India Company has no relation to the China war. They have so little confidence in the statement they have drawn up, that they have forwarded it to me, not officially, but privately, as an approximation to the real amount. The cost of horses, bullocks, and ponies comes to £88,600; ammunition, £16,000; advance of pay to the force on embarkation, £145,702; value of stores issued £30,000. Altogether, with the hire of the Indian Government steamships, with rations and allowances to troops on board ship, coals, &c., we have a total of £1,900,922. That is the amount of the East India claim due to us in the course of the year, supposing that the war lasts for a year, and that the ships are kept on for that time. The War Office Estimate includes the following items:—Difference between British and India rates of pay, allowances to wives and children, cost of Natives attached to the force, &c., for 10,985 Europeans, £526,355; cost of 7,623 Native troops, including pay, allowances, provisions, &c., £182,715; extra clothing and necessaries £50,000; extra provisions, forage, land transport, &c., £268,000; extra warlike and other stores, £150,000; extra hospital charges, including hospital ships, £284,208; sanitary establishments at the Cape, £23,792; estimated cost of Native Indian troops previously in China, £67,666 — making a total of £1,552,736. Then there is the Admiralty Estimate to the amount of £359,017. From the total a deduction must be made of the sums which may not come into payment during the year 1860-61. The Estimate had been fixed roughly, as I have stated, at £3,800,000.

I will not now enter into the policy of the war, because I have already had an opportunity of expressing my own opinions on that matter when the question was raised at the earlier part of the Session. At one time there was every reason to hope from the advices which were received from China that hostilities would have come to an end, and that a great demonstration of force would alone have proved sufficient to procure us redress for the outrages which had been committed at the mouth of the Peiho. We have been disappointed in that hope. Those, however, who are best informed on the subject still maintain that the Tartar Chief who is at the head of the war party in China, and who distinguished himself by the arrangements he made for our repulse at the Peiho, stands too near the Throne to be agreeable to the Emperor of China. He derives great power from the party of which he is the organ, and till some defeat or disaster happens to him, there is little likelihood of a change in the policy of the Chinese Government. But should any reverse befall him, it would be gladly made use of by the Government to reverse a policy which has been originated by one of whom they are so jealous. These are mere speculations, it may be said, but they come from an authoritative source. Her Majesty's Government would certainly receive with the greatest delight and satisfaction any news that would encourage us in the hope that we are likely to enter into a better state of relations with the Chinese. In the meanwhile I think no one can deny that we are bound to provide for the possibility of continuing hostile operations. We have very large forces in China exposed to a deadly climate, and we are bound to provide them with every means to enable them to bring the contest to a speedy and successful issue. Under these circumstances, I do not believe the House will be staggered even by the large amount of this Estimate. Our Commanders in China are men in whom we have a right to repose the greatest confidence, for they are tried men. I have received from General Sir Hope Grant the expression of his confidence in and admiration for the activity, resources, and forethought which he sees displayed by Admiral Hope. Of General Sir Hope Grant's own judgment, prudence, and energy I have formed the highest opinion from the communications I have had with him. I think that the view he took of the question as to the pay of the troops showed great judgment, and on another instance he also displayed a wise discretion. When ordered to occupy Chusan as a depot, he found that the lodgings for the troops were small, inconvenient, damp, and excessively unhealthy. He therefore decided not to endanger the health of his men by leaving them at Chusan, and, taking upon himself the responsibility of disobeying instructions, he at once carried them to a neighbouring island of sandy soil, well watered, and wholesome. Indeed, in all his actions it was impossible not to be struck with the judgment and foresight displayed by General Sir Hope Grant, as well as by Sir John Michell, his second in command; and we may safely rely upon it that whatever can be done by brave and practised soldiers, will be accomplished by our forces in China. Looking at the late period of the Session, it is important for the Government and for the country that this matter should be decided as soon as possible; and, without making any further observations, I beg to move that a sum of £3,800,000 be granted to Her Majesty for the China War.

Mr. Sidney Herbert

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,800,000, be granted to Her Majesty towards defraying the Expenses of Naval and Military Operations in China, beyond the ordinary Grants for Army and Naval Services for the year 1860-1, including a repayment of £443,896 to the Government of India for Advances on Account of former Expeditions in China."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he thought that the Committee had some reason to be surprised at the amount of the Vote now asked when they remembered that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 10th of February in the present year, estimated the expenditure on account of the China war at £500,000. He ventured to say that at the beginning of the present Session the House had no conception that it was about to be involved in an expenditure of nearly £4,000,000. Such, however, was the fact, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer must have been, he was certain, among the first to regret that he had framed his Budget on the notion that an expenditure really of £4,000,000, would only be £500,000. Various branches of taxation were handled by the right hon. Gentleman in a very decided way, to which, if there had been a clear surplus, there would have been little objection. But remissions of duties had been made in the face of an enormous expenditure, which must have been well anticipated. The right hon. Gentleman might perhaps, be able to explain that to the House, but the item of £443,896, belonging to the last China war, must have been well known. It was inexplicable to him how the right hon. Gentleman could assume a surplus of £500,000 when there was that outstanding Indian claim, that was sure to come in whether they had a China war or not. The statement of the Secretary of State for War was clear as far as it went, but it showed the danger that was impending over English finance. The House could not fail to perceive how Indian and English finance were getting mixed up together. He submitted that the proposed Vote of £3,800,000 ought to be divided into two separate portions, the sum of £433,000 for the outstanding Indian debt forming one Vote and the balance another. If the Vote of credit now demanded were added to the 850,000 already voted in March, the China Vote would be brought up to £4,600,000, excluding the old India Bill. He could not, however, admit that the Vote before the House was to be a Vote of credit, and it would be good policy to try and divide the £4,600,000 under certain heads of expenditure. The House might not be able to have an estimate of each branch of expenditure, but unless they had such an estimate what security was there that the money would be spent under these heads, or how was there to be any appropriation or any audit? The Earl of Ellenborough stated the other day in "another place" that he found no difficulty in making out an estimate for a former Chinese war. [Mr. S. HERBERT: The result was voted in a lump sum.] He would not enter upon the policy of the present China war except to say that he believed they could not enter upon a more ruinous war. The great power of two Empires of Europe was about to be brought to bear against the kingdom of China, and he feared that the result would be to involve that kingdom in anarchy and ruin rather than to extend our commerce. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would undertake on the Report to make a detailed estimate, with a large margin for contingencies.

MR. HANKEY said, he wished to know how far the estimate for outstanding Indian accounts was carried up to the present day. It was said that the war could not be carried on by means of the troops in India, except at the expense in the first instance of the Government of India; but the right hon. Gentleman proposed to alter this system. [Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT: I said it ought to be paid within the year.] As soon as the troops left this country every item was paid by the Government of India, but the charge for recruiting, which amounted to a large sum was paid in this country, and repaid by the East India Government. He wished to know whether the charge for recruiting had been taken into the account.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not know how far it might be possible to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby), and divide the Vote of Credit for the actual expenses of the war into various items. The difficulty might be that, in appropriating a certain portion for stores, transports, and freights, they might allot too much for one head and too little for another. But the item of £443,896 in payment of an old debt might be and ought to be separated from the rest. The House knew how much was wanted for that account and could appropriate it, but unless that were done the money might all be spent in stores, transports, or freights. Whether a further separation were possible he did not know, but it was important to get those old debts settled.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that in answer to the question of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey) he wished to state that the outstanding account between the East India Government and the War Department relative to recruiting was not included in the Estimate, because it was a running account which was charged on the ordinary Estimates.

GENERAL PEELE said, there was a fixed charge for every infantry soldier in excess of the Indian establishment, and that in consequence of the great number sent out in excess of that establishment there were certain amounts due from the Indian to the British revenue. Those amounts, however, became repayable from the latter to the former when the men were sent back, so that for every infantry soldier who had been despatched from India to China a sum of £17, for every cavalry soldier a sum of £30, and for every artilleryman a sum of £50 would have to be refunded, and those sums were not, he contended, included in the present Estimates. He should also wish to ascertain from his right hon. Friend how much of the £3,800,000, for which a Vote was to be taken, had been already expended. He might add that he thought his right hon. Friend was hardly justified in deducting from the expenses of the China war the amount paid to troops who were represented here by a force of embodied Militia, which could be disembodied if those troops were available at home.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he would try to explain, although he could not give any very satisfactory answer to the hon. Baronet's suggestion of framing the Estimate under various heads of expenditure, distinguishing the expenses on account of the British and Native forces, with a statement of what monies had already been drawn on account of the war in China. The latter could not possibly be ascertained until the accounts for the Indian army for 1859-60 were sent home. Until then the Government could not tell under what heads there was a deficiency or an excess. Not a sixpence, however, of the Vote asked for was applicable to any deficiency or excess in the last year. That would be covered out of the £850,000 voted at the beginning of the Session; but if there was any sufficient saving over the ordinary Estimate to cover it then the Vote of Credit would not be applied, or applied only to meet the deficiency; otherwise the money would be applicable to the expenses of the war in the present year. The Government at home did not know what had been actually spent. The East India Government had told them what may have been spent, and the Government wished only to take such a sum as would enable them in the course of the year to pay expenses on account, either previously to or after audit, instead of postponing the settlement for three or four years.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he should propose to diminish the Vote for £3,800,000 by £443,896, the amount due to the Indian Government, and to leave the surplus applicable for the purposes intended.

SIR FRANCIS BARING concurred in the expediency of acceding to the proposition of the hon. Baronet.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT signified his assent.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham has expressed his surprise at the large amount of money which the House is asked to grant on account of the war with China, and in that surprise I myself was, I must confess, disposed to share, when the enormous amount required was first brought under my notice. The present state of things has, however, been with the Government only a recent discovery, for although it was obvious ever since our ultimatum or proposals had been rejected by the Chinese, that war would in all likelihood ensue, and a Vote required, yet it was only within a short period that we were enabled to form anything like an accurate conjecture as to the probable expenditure which would be rendered necessary, and I need scarcely add that every fresh communication tends to show that the limits of the probable demand must be extended. But the hon. Baronet contends that it was wrong to state in the House of Commons in February last that there would be a surplus of half a million in round numbers on the balance of revenue and expenditure, when outstanding debts to about the same amount were due to the East India Company which the Government must have known would become payable. Now, on that point, the hon. Baronet is entirely in error, for the Government had not the smallest knowledge that the money would become payable, nor am I aware they could possess any such information. The fact is that this money was found to have become payable after a close inquiry into running accounts, consisting of a great variety of items and a lengthened correspondence and discussions with respect to them, which extended over a number of years. For my own part, I had no knowledge whatever when the Estimates of the year were framed, as to what sums were likely to become payable between the East India and the Home Government, nor did I think any officer of the Government could have furnished me with any prospective information on the subject. That is my answer with regard to the £500,000 in question. But the hon. Baronet has gone further, and contends that the Government ought not to have entertained any project for the general reconstruction or modification of the taxation of the country at a time when there was so large an expenditure as that for the China war in prospect. Now, the answer to that charge must, in a great measure, depend upon how far this expenditure could safely be said to be in propect at the time, and how far the Government were in possession of information on the subject beyond that which was open to every Member of the House. Let me for a moment suppose that we had peculiar means of estimating the probable amount of the expenditure in question, and that we had in consequence known in February last that it would be necessary to make provision for £3,800,000; it is obvious that in order to do so we must have asked the House, even though no tax were repealed and no commercial treaty with France were concluded, to impose £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 in the shape of fresh taxes on the country, a proposal which, in my opinion, it would be most unreasonable on our part to make. The truth of the matter is—and this, however, is the moral to be drawn from discussions such as this in which we are engaged—that it is utterly and absolutely impossible to estimate the entire charge for a war arising under circumstances such as those in which that with China has originated. There were but two elements of the case upon which to found a decision in our possession in February, the one being that we knew the terms which we meant to propose to China; the other, that we were aware of the amount of force which the Cabinet had decided on sending to that country. The terms embraced a demand for explanation of the attack on our ships, and the ratification of the treaty which the Earl of Elgin had made; but did not include any demand for compensation in money over and above that which the Chinese had already promised to pay. The amount of force which the Cabinet decided on sending out was 10,000 men, in case the whole force consisted of Europeans, but in the event of any small portion of it being composed of Native Indian troops, its numbers were to be proportionately increased, so as to render it equal in point of efficiency to an army of 10,000 Europeans. That was the knowledge which the Government possessed in February. I do not know whether the House was also in possession of the terms that had been proposed to China, but it did know the intentions of the Government as to the number of men to be sent. Now, just see what the intentions of the Government at home are worth as to proceedings of this nature at the other end of the world. The terms we intended to send to China were essentially altered, and a compensation was demanded for reasons of policy which appeared conclusive to our representative in China. I do not cast any blame upon that gentleman, but the fact illustrates the necessary feebleness and inefficiency of control which the Cabinet in London can exercise over transactions of this kind. Then, as to the amount of force. The amount of the forces under orders for China, which have left the ports of England and India for that country, is nearly twice the amount upon which the Cabinet had decided. Under these circumstances the hon. Baronet can easily judge how impossible it was for the Cabinet at home to form a clear judgment of the likelihood of a war, and of its scale of cost. Besides this the Committee must recollect that this mode of providing the cost of these wars is quite new to our annals.

General Peel

We have unfortunately had a variety of these wars, but they have been paid for almost entirely through the medium of the finance of the East India Company, the demands made upon this House at the commencement of those wars being very insignificant, and, for the most part, the cost has been repaid when the wars were concluded. The first of these wars was in 1840, and the sum voted by this House in that year was £173,000. In 1841 it only grew to £400,000. In 1842 it increased to nearly £1,100,000, and in 1843 a further sum of £821,000 was voted, and even then a large balance remained, a great part of which was not disposed of until years after. Now, we are in a different state of circumstances. A large portion of the expenditure is still to be defrayed through the medium of the East India Government; but in consequence of the change which has taken place in the Government of the East Indies, as well as the circumstances of the country, it has become our duty to ask the House to provide at once the means to meet, as far as we can estimate it, the whole expenditure that will be incurred either directly by ourselves or indirectly by the Indian Government.

The Committee must remember that in respect of a good deal of this expenditure it is in advance. The hon. Baronet has given notice of a Motion to ask what advances have already been made on account of the war in China. I do not apprehend that it will be possible to answer that Motion, because the great bulk of the expenditure is paid either through the medium of the East India Government, of whose account we are not in possession, or through the me-debate it was called an apology. Well then, here we find the Government not regarding sufficiently that important object of trade, as to which I quite agree with the noble Lord, but embarking in those ruinous wars in order to force on that distant and half-civilized empire the forms of European diplomacy. I confess we cannot regard our present position with respect to China with too much anxiety. It is not only that beyond all questions serious doubts have long been entertained, and are at this moment entertained with regard to the whole justice and propriety of our policy. It is not only that we are asked now to embark in what, to use the popular phrase of the day, is a "gigantic" expenditure; but, unhappily in addition to all this, at a moment when we ought to have our resources of all kinds concentrated at home, we find our pecuniary resources and our military resources divided and distracted by embarking in this unfortunate struggle. ["Hear, hear!"] I am glad to hear that cheer from the Treasury Bench. I am glad to see that they feel the magnitude of this evil, because they cannot recognize it without seeing the immense responsibility that rests on them if they are pressing demands on China one iota beyond what the strictest view of the justice of the case, and the commercial interests of this country demand. What is the expense involved? It is perfectly frightful. I believe at this moment we are committed by this unhappy struggle to an expenditure amounting to between £5,000,000 and £6,000,000. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Nearly £6,000,000.] There was £850,000 from the last financial year; the additions to the Army and Navy Estimates for the current year, and now this enormous Vote of nearly £4,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War sought to reduce the amount of this expenditure by telling us that if a large proportion of this force had not been engaged in this struggle in China they would have been on the establishment at home, but he forgot the regiments of embodied militia in this country represented seven battalions that might have been dispensed with. The statement of the right hon Gentleman was perfectly fair, but this raises another question of considerable interest, and that is whether or not we ought not to have heard a little more of this enormous amount of expenditure when the finances of the year were explained. I have no right or inclination to accuse the right

Sir John Pakington

hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer with having dealt in the least unfairly by the House; but I must say, after hearing the explanations given this evening, the impression does remain on my mind that Government ought to have given more detailed information on this matter when the Budget was brought forward. I remember nothing in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman in connection with the expenditure in China but the Vote of Credit for £500,000 which he then proposed to take. And what has his argument been to-night? In answer to my hon. Friend (Sir H. Willoughby) he has just told us that it was impossible for the Government to foresee that they would be involved in an expenditure of nearly £4,000,000, and that therefore he would not have been justified on the 10th of February in proposing taxes to meet so uncertain an expenditure. But that is not the issue raised. The question is whether, in the state of our relations with China at that moment, the Government were justified in proposing to remit taxation; whether they were justified in tampering with the finances of this country as they did on the 10th of February, when they must have known that this immense expenditure was at least a probability. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that all they then knew of was what he called a peaceful remonstrance, and he says the magnitude of these expenses is a recent discovery. But let me ask him whether the cost of the peaceful remonstrance was not at that time incurred. What was the form of the peaceful remonstrance? It was the despatch of a very powerful force, in order to give weight and dignity to the representations which we intended to make to the Chinese Government. I stated long before that I attached no blame to the Government in this respect. On the contrary, I think they were right in making this peaceful remonstrance in a formidable shape; that they were right in considering the prestige and the power of England, and in sending to China a force competent to support their demands. But they must have known that even in the event of their proposals being accepted, a peaceful remonstrance of this kind would be a most costly proceeding, and that its expenses must be defrayed from the revenue of the current year. I must say, therefore, that the explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman upon this point has not been satisfactory. The Government ought to have foreseen—I really do not know how they could have avoided foreseeing—that there was no reasonable chance of £500,000 covering the cost incurred, and I repeat that they were not justified in tampering with the resources of the country when they had the probability of this war hanging over them. We have also, I think, a right to some further explanation. The Committee have been told with great candour that if this war goes on they must not suppose £6,000,000 will last very long, and that in all probability the second year will be even more costly than the first. Well now, what are you going to fight for? What practical advantages to this country are you seeking to obtain? Are you fighting for an apology? Are you fighting for the ratification of a treaty which we know is worth little when you have got it? These are questions of the gravest character. We are embarking in an expenditure which is fearful in amount. The Government ask us to commit ourselves to an outlay of not less than £6,000,000 for the current year, with the prospect that unless matters are managed with the greatest wisdom, delicacy, and success we may be involved in still larger expenses in future years. I say, then, in the name of the British public that we are entitled to a fuller explanation than we have yet received as to the definite objects of the Chinese expedition, the intentions of the Government, the mode in which they propose to carry out those intentions, the instructions they have given, and the security which the public will have that these enormous sums of money will produce satisfactory results.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £3,356,104, be granted to Her Majesty, towards defraying the Expenses of Naval and Military Operations in China, beyond the ordinary grants for Army and Navy Services for the year 1860-1.”

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Whatever may be done with regard to the Motion, I cannot allow the statement of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down to pass entirely unnoticed. I am quite aware of the grave responsibility which hangs over the Government, but we have sharers in that responsibility. I am not about to blame the right hon. Gentleman, or the Government to which he belonged, but the Committee must take into account the orders given and the course pursued by the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues when in office. The news of the Treaty of Tien-tsin was received by the Earl of Derby's Government with very great joy. We heard everywhere, where the Earl of Derby appeared, great commendation of the Earl of Elgin for signing that treaty. The late Government therefore made the signing of the treaty no matter of blame. But what did they proceed to do? According to the views which some hon. Gentlemen entertain—views which I do not adopt, and with which I do not agree—they might have instructed Mr. Bruce to come to any agreement with the Chinese, who are much better acquainted with diplomacy than the right hon. Gentleman seems to suppose. The Chinese were quite ready to negotiate the treaty over again, and to ask that the Articles which were disagreeable to them should be revised and the objectionable parts omitted. Mr. Bruce might then have gone to Peking as Mr. Ward went, and he might have been sent back to procure a ratification of the treaty elsewhere. All this might have been done, but that was not the course which the Earl of Malmesbury and the right hon. Gentleman followed. They desired Mr. Bruce to go in force to the mouth of the Peiho. Two months before we came into office there was a meeting at Hong Kong, at which Mr. Bruce attended with Sir Charles Van Straubenzee and Rear Admiral Hope, to consider what were the instructions of the Government and what it behoved them to do; and they came to the unanimous conclusion that it was their duty to go with an imposing force to the mouth of the Peiho. This is the statement made—“Sir Charles Van Straubenzee and Admiral Hope concurred in this view. The latter said that his instructions contemplated the Minister being escorted with an imposing force.” What was the meaning of that? From whence did Admiral Hope receive these instructions? Why, from the Admiralty, at which the right hon. Gentleman presided; and, therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman comes down now with an air of surprise, wondering how it is that the present Ministry have involved the country in a war, calling us to an account for so doing, and delivering solemn warnings, I must say that it is hardly in keeping with the position he has filled and the course he has followed upon this question. Our commanders thought it right to do what they had been commanded to do, and went to the mouth of the Peiho with an imposing force. They had then no further instructions. The Earl of Malmesbury was quite right when he said he had given no instructions to Mr. Bruce and Admiral Hope to enter the Peiho, clear the river, and proceed to Tien-tsin by force. But these gentlemen, being without instructions, found themselves, as a British Plenipotentiary and Admiral, in a considerable difficulty. The Chinese are in the habit of carrying shields upon which frightful heads are represented, and they suppose that on beholding those terrible countenances the enemy will run away, but if the enemy does not run away they are very apt to run away themselves. Now, if our commanders, arriving off the Peiho with an imposing force, had turned round on finding that it did not impose on the Chinese, and had set sail in the other direction for Hong Kong, this would have been an imitation of the Chinese in what is not the most honourable or distinguished part of the Chinese policy. I say, then, that the right hon. Gentleman is himself in a great degree responsible for what was done on this occasion by Mr. Bruce and Admiral Hope; men, we must remember, with English hearts and feelings, with English pride, and desirous to uphold the national honour. Then, what was it we desired? As my right hon. Friend has said, we desired first an explanation; but, when we found that the Emperor sanctioned these proceedings, although everybody pretended that he knew nothing of what was going on, and that they were fighting on their own account, we then demanded an apology for these proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman says I stated that our only business in China was trade; but he added, most truly, that it must be trade, with security to the persons and the property of British subjects. Now, when a British force had attempted to go up the river, with a view to obtain the ratification of the Treaty of Tien-tsin; and when they had been treacherously attacked—their loss in killed and wounded being 400 or 500 men—the Cabinet felt that if they had then sent humbly to ask permission to have the treaty ratified, without a word more being said on our part, they would have been exposing the lives and property of every British trader in China to certain risk, and, probably, in most cases, to certain destruction. Is there anything wrong in that supposition? The right hon. Gentleman asks a further question—what is our present policy in China? Surely, he must have read the despatches. We asked, in the first place, that the whole Treaty of Tien-tsin should be accepted with an apology, and that then no indemnity or compensation would be sought for. It appeared the French Government had sent orders that their representative should claim compensation. Mr. Bruce informed us, by a despatch of the 6th of February, that he had considered the danger there would be in making a separate demand from that of the French; and that therefore he had included in his demands a claim for compensation likewise. It does not seem that this claim to compensation made any difference to the Chinese answer, which amounted to a total refusal of our terms. Will any man say, then, that these terms are not moderate and reasonable? The question, then, came to be whether the force that we have sent out must not proceed, and must not insist on compliance with our demands. The question to be considered to-night is, whether you will sanction the expenses we have incurred, in pursuance of a policy which I hold to be right, and which I am ready to defend, but for which the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his colleagues are as much responsible as Her Majesty's Government.

Lord John Russell

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, there could be no doubt whatever that we were now at war with China, and that that war was the result of twenty years of the most flagrant policy on our part. But the more immediate question before the Committee was whether they would grant a sum of £3,800,000 to Her Majesty's Government, and upon what pretence they should grant it. That money he believed had been spent, and they would never see a farthing of it. By the ordinary mode of proceeding the delivery of the troops would have been taken from Chatham, but now it was taken at Singapore, whither the men had gone from Bengal, and at Singapore they would come upon the finances of India. Now we could see the result of taking India under our protection. The two accounts would run one into the other to such a degree that a clever Chancellor of the Exchequer would easily be able so to mystify the House that they would not be aware where the one began or the other ended. That conviction had weighed on his mind all this Session, and guided his votes. Nothing could have been more reckless or improvident than the right hon. Gentleman's Budget. They had the French Treaty brought forward to throw dust in their eyes. They also had a remission of taxes, and that in the face of a deficiency which was certain to arise from this cause. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them of the considerations which influenced the Government in this matter, one of which considerations was that the Chinese had gained a great and palpable victory. Would anybody say it was an easy thing to deal with Asiatics when they had gained a victory? That being so, the Government ought not to have wantonly thrown away the resources at their command. They were entering on a course of warfare with the Chinese of which no man could see the end. It was the height of imprudence to have had anything to do with the Peiho or Peking. It was the greatest fallacy to say our going to the Peiho was for the protection of British lives and property in China. The Gulf of Pechelée was a sealed book to our commerce. Where British subjects and British property really were, there alone they could be and ought to be protected. If we took up a good strategical position at the points where our trade was actually carried on, or one that commanded the internal navigation of China, no doubt we could induce the Chinese Government to allow that trade to be satisfactorily pursued, which was our only justification for going to China at all.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he would tell the House why they were fighting in China. They were fighting because they had sent a diplomatist to China, and given him a great deal too much power. If the Admiral and General had been left to themselves, and not goaded on by Mr. Bruce, we should never have had the Peiho business, nor had to pay the money for this war. The Earl of Elgin when in China tried to exercise the same power over his gallant Friend near him (Admiral Seymour) as Mr. Bruce did over Admiral Hope; but his gallant Friend, who knew best how operations in that country should be carried on, resisted the pressure put upon him, and the consequence was that he succeeded in everything he attempted at the Peiho. If Admiral Hope and General Straubenzee had been left to themselves, no doubt the results would have been the same. A diplomatist sent out with such large powers was sure to make a mess of it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I hope the House will not agree to this Motion. By dividing the Vote my right hon. Friend has taken away all reason for reporting progress, because the second Vote will enable those hon. Gentlemen who still wish to speak on the general subject to deliver their sentiments on the second Vote. Hon. Gentlemen go on as if they imagined the Session would be eternal—as if the year was to be devoted entirely to the proceedings of this House. We go on from day to day, with a solemn air, putting off business when really there is not a day to spare. Hon. Gentlemen ought to recollect that there is a great deal of business before us, and that if we go on putting off these Votes from day to day there will be no end of the Session. I shall, therefore, certainly oppose the Motion, and I will take the sense of the House on the subject.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the reason he had moved to report progress was that he and his Friends on that side had been taken by surprise at the magnitude of the Vote, which was what none of them had ever imagined before it was laid on the table. He also complained that no Foreign-Office despatches on this subject had been produced of later date than the 10th of November.

MR. DISRAELI: I think if the noble Lord had made his speech on the value of time at the beginning of the Session it would have had some effect on the House, and might have exercised a beneficial influence on our proceedings. Unfortunately the Government were not then impressed with the truth which the noble Lord has now embraced. But we cannot conceal from ourselves that we have now considerably passed Midsummer-day, and I believe there is every wish on the part of the House to assist the Government in carrying on the business of the country, provided that it can be done with a fair exercise of our Parliamentary rights and our public duties, which, I trust, however advanced may be the period of the Session, we shall not be induced to forget. It certainly does appear that by dividing the Vote into two an opportunity will be afforded to hon. Gentlemen to make their not unnatural comments on the unsatisfactory state of our affairs in China; and, therefore, I venture to ask my hon. Friend not to press his Motion. But the noble Lord ought to recollect that this important discussion began late in the evening, and filled and the course he has followed upon this question. Our commanders thought it right to do what they had been commanded to do, and went to the mouth of the Peiho with an imposing force. They had then no further instructions. The Earl of Malmesbury was quite right when he said he had given no instructions to Mr. Bruce and Admiral Hope to enter the Peiho, clear the river, and proceed to Tien-tsin by force. But these gentlemen, being without instructions, found themselves, as a British Plenipotentiary and Admiral, in a considerable difficulty. The Chinese are in the habit of carrying shields upon which frightful heads are represented, and they suppose that on beholding those terrible countenances the enemy will run away, but if the enemy does not run away they are very apt to run away themselves. Now, if our commanders, arriving off the Peiho with an imposing force, had turned round on finding that it did not impose on the Chinese, and had set sail in the other direction for Hong Kong, this would have been an imitation of the Chinese in what is not the most honourable or distinguished part of the Chinese policy. I say, then, that the right hon. Gentleman is himself in a great degree responsible for what was done on this occasion by Mr. Bruce and Admiral Hope; men, we must remember, with English hearts and feelings, with English pride, and desirous to uphold the national honour. Then, what was it we desired? As my right hon. Friend has said, we desired first an explanation; but, when we found that the Emperor sanctioned these proceedings, although everybody pretended that he knew nothing of what was going on, and that they were fighting on their own account, we then demanded an apology for these proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman says I stated that our only business in China was trade; but he added, most truly, that it must be trade, with security to the persons and the property of British subjects. Now, when a British force had attempted to go up the river, with a view to obtain the ratification of the Treaty of Tien-tsin; and when they had been treacherously attacked—their loss in killed and wounded being 400 or 500 men—the Cabinet felt that if they had then sent humbly to ask permission to have the treaty ratified, without a word more being said on our part, they would have been exposing the lives and property of every British trader in China to certain risk, and, probably, in most cases, to certain destruction. Is there anything wrong in that supposition? The right hon. Gentleman asks a further question—what is our present policy in China? Surely, he must have read the despatches. We asked, in the first place, that the whole Treaty of Tien-tsin should be accepted with an apology, and that then no indemnity or compensation would be sought for. It appeared the French Government had sent orders that their representative should claim compensation. Mr. Bruce informed us, by a despatch of the 6th of February, that he had considered the danger there would be in making a separate demand from that of the French; and that therefore he had included in his demands a claim for compensation likewise. It does not seem that this claim to compensation made any difference to the Chinese answer, which amounted to a total refusal of our terms. Will any man say, then, that these terms are not moderate and reasonable? The question, then, came to be whether the force that we have sent out must not proceed, and must not insist on compliance with our demands. The question to be considered to-night is, whether you will sanction the expenses we have incurred, in pursuance of a policy which I hold to be right, and which I am ready to defend, but for which the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his colleagues are as much responsible as Her Majesty's Government.

Lord John Russell

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, there could be no doubt whatever that we were now at war with China, and that that war was the result of twenty years of the most flagrant policy on our part. But the more immediate question before the Committee was whether they would grant a sum of £3,800,000 to Her Majesty's Government, and upon what pretence they should grant it. That money he believed had been spent, and they would never see a farthing of it. By the ordinary mode of proceeding the delivery of the troops would have been taken from Chatham, but now it was taken at Singapore, whither the men had gone from Bengal, and at Singapore they would come upon the finances of India. Now we could see the result of taking India under our protection. The two accounts would run one into the other to such a degree that a clever Chancellor of the Exchequer would easily be able so to mystify the House that they would not be aware where the one began or the other ended. That conviction had weighed on his mind all this Session, and guided his votes. Nothing could have been more reckless or improvident than the right hon. Gentleman's Budget. They had the French Treaty brought forward to throw dust in their eyes. They also had a remission of taxes, and that in the face of a deficiency which was certain to arise from this cause. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them of the considerations which influenced the Government in this matter, one of which considerations was that the Chinese had gained a great and palpable victory. Would anybody say it was an easy thing to deal with Asiatics when they had gained a victory? That being so, the Government ought not to have wantonly thrown away the resources at their command. They were entering on a course of warfare with the Chinese of which no man could see the end. It was the height of imprudence to have had anything to do with the Peiho or Peking. It was the greatest fallacy to say our going to the Peiho was for the protection of British lives and property in China. The Gulf of Pechelée was a sealed book to our commerce. Where British subjects and British property really were, there alone they could be and ought to be protected. If we took up a good strategical position at the points where our trade was actually carried on, or one that commanded the internal navigation of China, no doubt we could induce the Chinese Government to allow that trade to be satisfactorily pursued, which was our only justification for going to China at all.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he would tell the House why they were fighting in China. They were fighting because they had sent a diplomatist to China, and given him a great deal too much power. If the Admiral and General had been left to themselves, and not goaded on by Mr. Bruce, we should never have had the Peiho business, nor had to pay the money for this war. The Earl of Elgin when in China tried to exercise the same power over his gallant Friend near him (Admiral Seymour) as Mr. Bruce did over Admiral Hope; but his gallant Friend, who knew best how operations in that country should be carried on, resisted the pressure put upon him, and the consequence was that he succeeded in everything he attempted at the Peiho. If Admiral Hope and General Straubenzee had been left to themselves, no doubt the results would have been the same. A diplomatist sent out with such large powers was sure to make a mess of it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I hope the House will not agree to this Motion. By dividing the Vote my right hon. Friend has taken away all reason for reporting progress, because the second Vote will enable those hon. Gentlemen who still wish to speak on the general subject to deliver their sentiments on the second Vote. Hon. Gentlemen go on as if they imagined the Session would be eternal—as if the year was to be devoted entirely to the proceedings of this House. We go on from day to day, with a solemn air, putting off business when really there is not a day to spare. Hon. Gentlemen ought to recollect that there is a great deal of business before us, and that if we go on putting off these Votes from day to day there will be no end of the Session. I shall, therefore, certainly oppose the Motion, and I will take the sense of the House on the subject.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the reason he had moved to report progress was that he and his Friends on that side had been taken by surprise at the magnitude of the Vote, which was what none of them had ever imagined before it was laid on the table. He also complained that no Foreign-Office despatches on this subject had been produced of later date than the 10th of November.

MR. DISRAELI: I think if the noble Lord had made his speech on the value of time at the beginning of the Session it would have had some effect on the House, and might have exercised a beneficial influence on our proceedings. Unfortunately the Government were not then impressed with the truth which the noble Lord has now embraced. But we cannot conceal from ourselves that we have now considerably passed Midsummer-day, and I believe there is every wish on the part of the House to assist the Government in carrying on the business of the country, provided that it can be done with a fair exercise of our Parliamentary rights and our public duties, which, I trust, however advanced may be the period of the Session, we shall not be induced to forget. It certainly does appear that by dividing the Vote into two an opportunity will be afforded to hon. Gentlemen to make their not unnatural comments on the unsatisfactory state of our affairs in China; and, therefore, I venture to ask my hon. Friend not to press his Motion. But the noble Lord ought to recollect that this important discussion began late in the evening, and filled and the course he has followed upon this question. Our commanders thought it right to do what they had been commanded to do, and went to the mouth of the Peiho with an imposing force. They had then no further instructions. The Earl of Malmesbury was quite right when he said he had given no instructions to Mr. Bruce and Admiral Hope to enter the Peiho, clear the river, and proceed to Tien-tsin by force. But these gentlemen, being without instructions, found themselves, as a British Plenipotentiary and Admiral, in a considerable difficulty. The Chinese are in the habit of carrying shields upon which frightful heads are represented, and they suppose that on beholding those terrible countenances the enemy will run away, but if the enemy does not run away they are very apt to run away themselves. Now, if our commanders, arriving off the Peiho with an imposing force, had turned round on finding that it did not impose on the Chinese, and had set sail in the other direction for Hong Kong, this would have been an imitation of the Chinese in what is not the most honourable or distinguished part of the Chinese policy. I say, then, that the right hon. Gentleman is himself in a great degree responsible for what was done on this occasion by Mr. Bruce and Admiral Hope; men, we must remember, with English hearts and feelings, with English pride, and desirous to uphold the national honour. Then, what was it we desired? As my right hon. Friend has said, we desired first an explanation; but, when we found that the Emperor sanctioned these proceedings, although everybody pretended that he knew nothing of what was going on, and that they were fighting on their own account, we then demanded an apology for these proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman says I stated that our only business in China was trade; but he added, most truly, that it must be trade, with security to the persons and the property of British subjects. Now, when a British force had attempted to go up the river, with a view to obtain the ratification of the Treaty of Tien-tsin; and when they had been treacherously attacked—their loss in killed and wounded being 400 or 500 men—the Cabinet felt that if they had then sent humbly to ask permission to have the treaty ratified, without a word more being said on our part, they would have been exposing the lives and property of every British trader in China to certain risk, and, probably, in most cases, to certain destruction. Is there anything wrong in that supposition? The right hon. Gentleman asks a further question—what is our present policy in China? Surely, he must have read the despatches. We asked, in the first place, that the whole Treaty of Tien-tsin should be accepted with an apology, and that then no indemnity or compensation would be sought for. It appeared the French Government had sent orders that their representative should claim compensation. Mr. Bruce informed us, by a despatch of the 6th of February, that he had considered the danger there would be in making a separate demand from that of the French; and that therefore he had included in his demands a claim for compensation likewise. It does not seem that this claim to compensation made any difference to the Chinese answer, which amounted to a total refusal of our terms. Will any man say, then, that these terms are not moderate and reasonable? The question, then, came to be whether the force that we have sent out must not proceed, and must not insist on compliance with our demands. The question to be considered to-night is, whether you will sanction the expenses we have incurred, in pursuance of a policy which I hold to be right, and which I am ready to defend, but for which the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his colleagues are as much responsible as Her Majesty's Government.

Lord John Russell

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, there could be no doubt whatever that we were now at war with China, and that that war was the result of twenty years of the most flagrant policy on our part. But the more immediate question before the Committee was whether they would grant a sum of £3,800,000 to Her Majesty's Government, and upon what pretence they should grant it. That money he believed had been spent, and they would never see a farthing of it. By the ordinary mode of proceeding the delivery of the troops would have been taken from Chatham, but now it was taken at Singapore, whither the men had gone from Bengal, and at Singapore they would come upon the finances of India. Now we could see the result of taking India under our protection. The two accounts would run one into the other to such a degree that a clever Chancellor of the Exchequer would easily be able so to mystify the House that they would not be aware where the one began or the other ended. That conviction had weighed on his mind all this Session, and guided his votes. Nothing could have been more reckless or improvident than the right hon. Gentleman's Budget. They had the French Treaty brought forward to throw dust in their eyes. They also had a remission of taxes, and that in the face of a deficiency which was certain to arise from this cause. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them of the considerations which influenced the Government in this matter, one of which considerations was that the Chinese had gained a great and palpable victory. Would anybody say it was an easy thing to deal with Asiatics when they had gained a victory? That being so, the Government ought not to have wantonly thrown away the resources at their command. They were entering on a course of warfare with the Chinese of which no man could see the end. It was the height of imprudence to have had anything to do with the Peiho or Peking. It was the greatest fallacy to say our going to the Peiho was for the protection of British lives and property in China. The Gulf of Pechellee was a sealed book to our commerce. Where British subjects and British property really were, there alone they could be and ought to be protected. If we took up a good strategical position at the points where our trade was actually carried on, or one that commanded the internal navigation of China, no doubt we could induce the Chinese Government to allow that trade to be satisfactorily pursued, which was our only justification for going to China at all.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he would tell the House why they were fighting in China. They were fighting because they had sent a diplomatist to China, and given him a great deal too much power. If the Admiral and General had been left to themselves, and not goaded on by Mr. Bruce, we should never have had the Peiho business, nor had to pay the money for this war. The Earl of Elgin when in China tried to exercise the same power over his gallant Friend near him (Admiral Seymour) as Mr. Bruce did over Admiral Hope; but his gallant Friend, who knew best how operations in that country should be carried on, resisted the pressure put upon him, and the consequence was that he succeeded in everything he attempted at the Peiho. If Admiral Hope and General Straubenzee had been left to themselves, no doubt the results would have been the same. A diplomatist sent out with such large powers was sure to make a mess of it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I hope the House will not agree to this Motion. By dividing the Vote my right hon. Friend has taken away all reason for reporting progress, because the second Vote will enable those hon. Gentlemen who still wish to speak on the general subject to deliver their sentiments on the second Vote. Hon. Gentlemen go on as if they imagined the Session would be eternal—as if the year was to be devoted entirely to the proceedings of this House. We go on from day to day, with a solemn air, putting off business when really there is not a day to spare. Hon. Gentlemen ought to recollect that there is a great deal of business before us, and that if we go on putting off these Votes from day to day there will be no end of the Session. I shall, therefore, certainly oppose the Motion, and I will take the sense of the House on the subject.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the reason he had moved to report progress was that he and his Friends on that side had been taken by surprise at the magnitude of the Vote, which was what none of them had ever imagined before it was laid on the table. He also complained that no Foreign-Office despatches on this subject had been produced of later date than the 10th of November.

MR. DISRAELI: I think if the noble Lord had made his speech on the value of time at the beginning of the Session it would have had some effect on the House, and might have exercised a beneficial influence on our proceedings. Unfortunately the Government were not then impressed with the truth which the noble Lord has now embraced. But we cannot conceal from ourselves that we have now considerably passed Midsummer-day, and I believe there is every wish on the part of the House to assist the Government in carrying on the business of the country, provided that it can be done with a fair exercise of our Parliamentary rights and our public duties, which, I trust, however advanced may be the period of the Session, we shall not be induced to forget. It certainly does appear that by dividing the Vote into two an opportunity will be afforded to hon. Gentlemen to make their not unnatural comments on the unsatisfactory state of our affairs in China; and, therefore, I venture to ask my hon. Friend not to press his Motion. But the noble Lord ought to recollect that this important discussion began late in the evening, and therefore the Motion of my hon. Friend is not unreasonable. It is only because I feel that another opportunity will be afforded to my hon. Friend, and those who think with him, to express their opinions that I venture to take the responsibility now of asking him not to press his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn; Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed. Resolutions to be reported To-morrow. Committee to sit again To-morrow.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND)
ACT, 1856, AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. CARDWELL moved for leave to introduce a Bill to continue and amend the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to continue and amend the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act (1856)."

MR. MAGUIRE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

LORD FERMOY objected to the Bill, as a libel on the condition of Ireland. That country was just as peaceable, and law was as well preserved, as in England. There was no reason for a coercion Bill, and he should vote against the introduction of the Bill.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON inquired of the hon. Member for Dungarvan whether he would withdraw the Amendment and test the question on the Motion for the introduction of the Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to continue and amend the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act (1856)."

MR. HENNESSY warned the House against passing another coercion Bill for Ireland, and moved the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 60: Majority 49.

Question again proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to continue and amend the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act (1856)."

MR. BRADY said, he was sorry to oppose a large number of Members of the House who had decided that the Bill should be introduced, but he did so from conscientious motives, and believing the Bill altogether unnecessary, and a degradation to Ireland, he should move that the House should adjourn.

MR. CARDWELL said, that nothing could be more reasonable than to express his opinion against the Bill, but why not do so at once, by voting against its introduction.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he had opposed the Bill when introduced by the Government of the Earl of Derby and he should oppose it now.

MR. MAGUIRE said, that the Bill was a stain and a disgrace, and he considered himself justified in taking advantage of every form of obstruction which the rules of the House afforded.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON complained that hon. Members who were against the Bill would not vote against it, but shirked the question.

MR. BLAKE pointed out that it was all very well for the noble Lord to accuse them of shirking the matter, when he knew he had the majority with him. Irish Members were entitled to use every mode of combating this odious Bill.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 9; Noes 61: Majority 52.

Question again proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to continue and amend the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act (1856)."

MR. SULLIVAN moved the adjournment of the Debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could quite understand the sincere objection to the Bill felt by the hon. Members, but did they hope to tire out the majority? He hardly thought that they would, on reflection, consider that persistence in such a course was consistent with the due discharge of their duty.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY taunted the Government with not having said a word of the character of the Bill, but wanted to get it through a stage without any explanation.

MR. CARDWELL stated that though it was true that the cases of putting the act in force were not frequent, a barbarous murder had recently been committed on the borders of Galway and Mayo, and he was sure that the peaceable inhabitants of that district would be very much alarmed if they had not the protection of the House.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. MAGUIRE opposed the introduction of the measure on the grounds alleged, and said that a persistence in the course they had taken was the only way to meet a tyrannical majority.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 59: Majority 48.

Question again proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to continue and amend the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act (1856)."

MR. MAGUIRE thought it was time for them all to go to-bed, as they had to be there again at twelve, and it was now half-past three, so he would move that the House do adjourn. At all events they ought to have mercy on the Speaker.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that if possible, he would rather move that the minority should have leave to go to bed.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 7; Noes 59: Majority 52.

MR. BLAKE moved the adjournment of the Debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that as the Gentlemen opposite were reduced to seven, he should suggest whether it would not be well that they should show themselves the seven wise men of England, and permit a division on the main Question.

MR. HENNESSY said, out of consideration for the Speaker he should suggest that they should divide on the introduction of the Bill.

MR. BLAKE withdrew the Motion for Adjournment.

Question put, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to continue and amend the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act (1856)."

The House divided:—Ayes 53; Noes 15: Majority 38.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. CARDWELL and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for Ireland.

Bill presented, and read 1^o; to be read 2^o on Monday next, and to be printed [No. 260.]

House adjourned at Four o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, July 13, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Registration of Births, &c., (Scotland); Tramways (Ireland);

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh and Montrose), &c.

2nd Labourers Cottages (Scotland.)

3rd Ionian Islands (Marriages); Railway Cheap Trains, &c.; Phoenix Park; Tenison's Charity; Local Government Supplemental.

ITALY.—THE ROMAN STATES.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he had given notice that he would move for certain papers additional to the despatches which had been produced from Mr. Lyons with regard to the condition of the Roman States. He was happy to take that opportunity to state that during the whole of the three years during which he had been in official communication with Mr. Lyons, there was the most complete concurrence between them on all subjects connected with the affairs of Italy, and he regretted that his promotion elsewhere had prevented Italy from having in the present crisis the benefit of his ability and experience. On a former occasion he had taken an opportunity to express his high sense of the merits of Mr. Odo Russell, and he was sure that gentleman would be the first to admit the great advantage he would now derive from having the benefit of Mr. Lyons' experience. These despatches when produced would show the efforts that had been made by Mr. Lyons and himself to induce the Papal Government to institute reforms: but their efforts were often frustrated by the conduct of others. On one occasion, in particular, there occurred an incident that ought to be known. Mr. Lyons had received some conciliatory instructions from Lord Clarendon, and he was making use of them to induce the Roman Government to institute some reform in their mode of government, when there arrived the account of a public declaration made by the highest Ministerial authority in the other House of Parliament, to the effect that the Roman States had never been so well governed as under the republic of Mazzini. Their Lordships could not conceive the painful effect that this declaration produced on the Papal Government. He was himself at that moment engaged with a person of high influence at the Court of Rome, endeavouring to persuade him to introduce that reform which he hoped the Roman people were now about to enjoy—the right of a deliberative council; but that Gentleman said, "How is it possible for us to institute reforms when we are told from your Parliament that the Government we ought to imitate is a Government that in our eyes was the impersonation of anarchy, a Government in which neither life nor property was secure? " Under these circumstances he thought it necessary to address a further despatch to the Government, stating the painful impression which this declaration had made, and communicating what he had ascertained as to the real facts of the case, to show the inaccuracy of the statements that had been made in the other House of Parliament. This was one of the despatches which he hoped the Government would not object to produce. His Motion would be for, Copies or Extracts from the Despatches of Her Majesty's Minister in Tuscany in 1855, 1856, and 1857, referring to the Condition and Administration of the Roman States.

SCOTTISH DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.—BILL PASSED.

LORD REDESDALE moved, that this Bill (which is a private Bill), be read 3^a.

LORD ST. LEONARDS remarking on the exclusive advantages which these companies obtained by private Acts of Parliament, suggested that a general Act ought to be passed, and expressed a hope that with that object the Government would early next Session give the subject their serious consideration.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought it very desirable that when lending powers of this kind were given to a company there should be some independent tribunal established to see that the money advanced was expended on a bond fide improvement. The question ought to form the subject of general legislation. It was very desirable, too, that some system should be adopted with regard to these private Bills which would bring them more particularly under the notice of the House, requiring them, for instance, to go through a Committee of the whole House.

LORD REDESDALE did not think that any good would be derived from treating these Bills in a different manner from other private Bills. It would be much better that the subject should be dealt with by a general law.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the subject should be taken into consideration by the Government, but, of course, he could not give a pledge that they would take any action upon it.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought it most

The Marquess of Normanby

objectionable that any lending or borrowing powers beyond those of the ordinary law should form part of a private Bill. If legislation were necessary, it should be in the shape of a general measure. He had strong objections to the Bill, though he could not take upon himself the responsibility of moving its rejection; but if there were a distinct understanding that the Government and the House would for the future set their faces against the introduction of such Bills some good would have been done by the present discussion.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH shared the opinion of the noble Earl that this matter should be dealt with in a general measure.

LORD ST. LEONARDS proposed that the consideration of the present and another similar Bill should be postponed for a fortnight.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH explained that the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company had been in existence for some time, and that it now sought merely to be placed in the same position as another company of the same kind in Scotland. He deprecated the maintenance of a monopoly, and opposed the Motion for postponement.

LORD ST. LEONARDS moved, That the further Debate be adjourned to Friday next.

On Question, That the said Debate be adjourned to Friday next? their Lordships divided:—Contents 36; Not-Contents 39: Majority 3.

Resolved in the negative: Then the original Motion was agreed to: Bill read 3^a accordingly: an Amendment made: Bill passed and sent to the Commons.

GALWAY HARBOUR BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3^a, with the Amendments.

On Motion that the Bill do pass,

THE MARQUIS OF CLANRICARDE said, that the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees had, in the exercise of his functions, struck out of the Bill two clauses which were of considerable importance. This made it necessary for him (the Marquess of Clanricarde) to take what was a rather inconvenient course. He might observe that the step taken by the Government of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) in granting a subsidy to a line of packets between Galway and America had already been attended with very important results. Two years ago there was not a single steam packet running between Ireland and America. At the present moment Sir C. Cunard's Transatlantic mail steamers called at one of the southern ports of Ireland; the Canadian Company's called at one of the northern; and there was this Galway line: so that Ireland was now practically recognized as the portion of the United Kingdom from which the packets employed in speedy communication between Europe and America should depart. The Bill before their Lordships was to improve the harbour of Galway; it proposed that a sum of £180,000 should be raised; part of this sum was to be applied to the payment of existing charges, and the remainder to the making of a pier and breakwater in Galway Harbour, and for other works in connection therewith. It was intended in the first place that the tolls on the harbour should be charged with the payment of this money; next that it should be raised off the property in the immediate neighbourhood; and, as a last resource, that a limited rate should be imposed upon the county. Now as the harbour was a benefit to the county as well as the town, such a mode of securing the money was not improper, though he admitted that that course should be adopted with great caution; moreover, the course was not without precedent. Taunts had been often thrown out that whenever an effort was made for the improvement of Ireland it was always at the expense of English capital; but this was now refuted in the case of Galway, which only sought powers to tax itself for a purpose that he believed would prove beneficial to the commerce of the United Kingdom. Not a word of any opposition to this Bill had they heard until last week, and this fact was the more extraordinary, inasmuch as the objects of the measure had been generally approved of. He was, therefore, extremely surprised to find that the Select Committee had struck out of the measure a clause which imposed upon the county Galway a guarantee for a large sum of money for the improvement of the harbour. He begged, therefore, to move that the clauses which had been struck out should be reinstated.

Amendment moved, in Preamble after ("Galway") to insert ("and county of Galway respectively").

THE EARL OF LUCAN hoped the House would reject the Amendment of the noble Marquess. The Chairman of the Select Committee had acted very wisely in striking out the clause in the Bill which devolved on the county of Galway the guaranteeing of a large sum of money for the improvement of the harbour, and had shown a wise discretion in declaring that the charge should not extend beyond the town. Under the Bill it was proposed to raise £180,000, of which £25,000 were to be applied in the payment of debts, and £100,000 were to be expended on a pier, breakwater, and graving docks—he wondered it was not for building ships. He believed that such a proposition was altogether without precedent. No doubt small sums had been expended on the repairs of fishing harbours under the Grand Jury Act, but that case did not afford a parallel to the present, in which a great national harbour was concerned. He believed it was the general wish of the landed proprietors of the county that the proposition of the noble Marquess should not be adopted. If the Amendment were agreed to, the result would be to impose a permanent charge of £1,700 a year upon the county funds.

LORD MONTEAGLE concurred with the noble Earl that this was the first time any proposition had been submitted to Parliament to impose a guarantee upon a county for works undertaken by local companies only, without any recommendation from the Board of Works in Ireland. He should oppose the Amendment. At the present moment the very existence of the packet station was at stake. Already £120,000 had disappeared in connection with Galway harbour, and the House was now called on to decide without a security as to the utility of the plans, or as to whether the harbour would be available for the purpose. He thought it would be better to suspend the further progress of the Bill until they had the plans and reports of competent engineers, and not allow £180,000, constituting a permanent fund, to be saddled on the country. If we were to have the American trade it was highly important there should be a proper packet station at Galway.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had always felt it to be his duty not to allow a new principle to be introduced in private legislation without it was a very sound one, or without its being the sanction of the House. The principle proposed in the present Bill was entirely a new one that of taxing a county for the improvement of a local harbour, and if adopted might be drawn into a precedent in numberless cases, to the injury of private enterprise ; and he thought the principle of guarantees in such cases was altogether objectionable. He had seen too much of the manner in which grand juries in Ireland would vote taxation in the shape of these guarantees to be very well satisfied with the prospect of an extension of it. In this case there was no security that the money proposed to be raised would be sufficient to complete the work, so that the county might be saddled to an indefinite extent.

EARL GRANVILLE was inclined to think that, when a district came forward ready to take the expense of an improvement on itself, instead of asking for public money, it was a principle he thought that ought to be encouraged rather than discouraged.

On Question, Whether the said words shall be there inserted ? their Lordships divided :—Contents 18; Not-Contents 26: Majority 8. Amendment disagreed to; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at a Half-past Seven o'clock, to Monday next,
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 13, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Volunteer Rifle Corps ; Landed Property Improvement (Ireland) ; Local Government Supplemental (No. 2) ; Theatres and Public Houses ; Bank of Ireland (No. 2).

3^o Census (England) ; Census (Ireland) ; Queen's Prison ; Court of Queen's Bench Act Amendment ; Friendly Societies Act Amendment ; Felony and Misdemeanour.

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL—CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

Bill Considered as amended.

Amendments made.

MR. WHITESIDE proposed a clause to the effect, that persons having power to grant a lease should also be enabled to enter into a binding preliminary contract. His object was to do away with the preliminary inquiry proposed in such cases, and which seemed to him to have been based on a distrust of the gentry of Ireland. He had no distrust of the landowners of Ireland, and therefore he wished to give the power to enter into such arrangements as were included in his clause.

Lord Redesdale

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

MR. DEASY opposed the clause. The real question involved in it was whether a limited owner was to be at liberty to make of his own accord a building lease, involving any amount of land and any amount of rent, affecting materially the interests of the reversioner, without his consent ; or whether he was to be placed under the limitations proposed in other parts of the Bill. The House had already resolved that previous inquiry before the Chairman of quarter sessions was in all cases necessary. This was done from no distrust of the landed gentry of Ireland, but from a conviction that such inquiry would be in the highest degree beneficial to all parties ; and he hoped the House would not depart from the principles of its previous decision.

MR. HENLEY stated that he could not give his consent to the clause proposed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside), which would enable a person having a life interest only to dispose of property belonging to the reversioner for a period of, perhaps, eighty or ninety years.

LORD NAAS said, he thought that the power in question might safely be granted to the limited owner under the restrictions which his right hon. and learned Friend would impose by other provisions which he meant to introduce.

MR. CARDWELL said, the object of the Government was to give as much facility as possible, but they must do that within reasonable limits, and within such limits as would allow them to obtain the general concurrence of the Legislature. They were now asked to enable a limited owner to alienate the whole of his estate, if he pleased, upon building leases in perpetuity, without a preliminary sanction of a court of law being required. That was a proposal which, he ventured to say, had never yet received the sanction of Parliament. He certainly could not think of agreeing to a proposal of the kind ; and, however desirous he might be to sanction any proposal coming from a quarter which he should have expected to be very tender of vested interests—he nevertheless felt driven to the necessity of opposing the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman.

Motion made, and Question put, “That the Clause be now read a second time.”

The House divided :—Ayes 19 ; Noes 86 : Majority 67.

MR. WHITESIDE proposed the introduction of a clause, granting an appeal from the decision of the Chairman upon any application for a charging order, in the same manner as an appeal by a plaintiff in a civil bill proceeding from a dismissal by such Chairman.

MR. CARDWELL objected to the clause as likely to complicate proceedings and increase the expense, and as in his opinion wholly unnecessary.

MR. BUTT supported the clause, and stated that the process of appeal was both simple and inexpensive.

MR. CARDWELL withdrew his objection, and the clause was added to the Bill.

MR. BUTT proposed the introduction of a clause to the effect that if, before the expiration of twenty years from the date of the completion of an improvement, the landlord should evict the tenant for any cause except non-payment of rent or breach of covenant, the tenant might proceed against the landlord to recover compensation for his bond fide expenditure and its unexhausted value.

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

MR. LANIGAN supported the clause.

MR. WHITESIDE opposed the clause, on the ground that it proposed to re-open a question which had been already settled, and on the faith of which many millions of property had been purchased under the title given by the Landed Estates Court.

MR. MONSELL supported the clause.

MR. DEASY said, he had always advocated a clause similar to that proposed, and his opinions had undergone no change whatever; but he yielded to the change of circumstances and the current of events in opposing the clause. He did not believe it would be possible to carry any retrospective measure. The Government had introduced the present Bill on the general understanding that no such principle would be recognized in it, and to agree to the clause of the hon. and learned Member for Youghal would be a breach of that understanding. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not press his clause to a division.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he would go as far as any man in the prospective alteration of the law, but he could not agree to the proposition for retrospective compensation.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY intimated that he should vote with the hon. and learned Member for Youghal, but would propose that the clause should not apply to any improvements made on the land conveyed to a purchaser for valuable consideration, or to any other case where injustice might arise from the creation of a new charge on the land.

THE O'DONOGHUE supported the clause, and stated that there was no change of opinion upon this question among the people of Ireland.

LORD FERMOY said, the Bill was a delusion, and would not settle the question of tenant-right in Ireland. It was unworthy of Members of the Government to declare their adhesion to the principle involved in the clause now before them, and then to go into the lobby and vote against it. He hoped his hon. Friend would press his clause to a division.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he thought it was a most unworthy position for a Government to be in to approve certain provisions, and yet not to vote for them because they believe they could not be carried. He was prepared to go as far as any one in favour of prospective compensation for improvements, but would be no party to retrospective compensation, which, he believed, would only lead to confusion.

MR. BRADY said, he wished to remind the noble Lord (Lord Fermoy) that he and his friends were parties to the overthrow of the Derby Government at a time when that Government was pledged to carry a good Tenant Right Bill. It was all very well for those hon. Members who then threw out the Derby Government to argue now for tenant-right, but they ought to have considered the consequences of their act on that occasion.

COLONEL GREVILLE regretted that so much time should be lost in the discussion of a question which could lead to no result. He would, however, support the clause, because it was just, and because he had always acted upon the principle embodied in it on his own property; but he felt it was impracticable.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 102: Majority 76.

Further proceeding on consideration of Bill, as amended, Adjourned till this day.

SENIOR NAVAL LIEUTENANTS.

MR. DUNN said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, if the Lords Commissioners have any intention of ameliorating the present position of the Senior Lieutenants of the Navy, either by promotion or increase of pay ; and whether their Lordships have considered the effect of the present system of promoting flag-Lieutenants to the rank of Commander on the termination of an admiral's command ?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the Lords of the Admiralty did not intend to increase the full pay of senior lieutenants. It was, however, their intention to grant an increase of half-pay, according to length of service and in conformity with the scheme which he had already laid before the House. If that scheme were carried out, the position and prospects of those gallant old officers with regard to promotion would undoubtedly be improved. In answer to the second question, he thought he had better read the order which had already been decided on by the Admiralty, with reference to the appointment of flag-Lieutenants. It was as follows :—

“ The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have thought fit to direct that in future whenever a flag-officer may be permitted to nominate an officer for promotion, it is to be understood that a lieutenant, when so nominated, must have completed at least five years' service in that rank at the date at which the flag-officer may be ordered to strike his flag, of which five years not less than three years shall have been served in a sea-going ship.”

CASE OF DR. GUYDIR.

COLONEL GREVILLE asked the Judge-Advocate, Whether it is true that Dr. Guydir, assistant-surgeon, Royal Longford Rifles, who was tried by a general court-martial on the 1st and 2nd of June last, was placed in arrest on the 10th day of May last, and still remains under arrest and debarred from practising his profession, in consequence of the finding of the Court not having yet been promulgated by the authorities ?

MR. HEADLAM said, it was perfectly true that Dr. Guydir had, in accordance with the rules of the service, been placed under arrest on the 10th of May, and that some delay had taken place before he had been tried before a court-martial. The trial had, however, come on early in June, and he had subsequently had two audiences of Her Majesty to ascertain her pleasure with respect to the finding of the Court. The matter had eventually been brought under the consideration of the Commander-in-Chief, and he was happy to say that the result was that Dr. Guydir would be released immediately by order of the Lord-Lieutenant of the county.

Mr. Dunn

INCH KEITH.

MR. BLACK rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, if, according to the communication made to the Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce in July last, it is still the intention of Government to place a battery on Inch Keith for the protection of the trade in the Firth of Forth ?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT answered in the affirmative.

On Question that the House at its rising Adjourn till Monday,

SWITZERLAND AND FRANCE.—THE CONGRESS.—QUESTION.

MR. KINGLAKE : I rise, Sir, to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether all the Eight Powers, as well as Switzerland and Sardinia, have consented to take part in the proposed Conference on the subject of the 92nd Article of the Definitive Act of Vienna, and whether there is any preliminary understanding between the Powers as to the basis on which the Conference will take place ? A very few words will suffice to explain the point I am anxious to bring under the notice of the House. Every one knows that in the contemplation of the eventuality of war in which either France or Austria should be engaged it was provided by the 92nd Article of the Treaty of Vienna that Switzerland in any such case should remain neuter, and that the two provinces of which we have heard so much—Chablais and Faucigny—should share that neutrality. For that purpose they were placed under the protection of Sardinia. The difficulty which has now been occasioned arises thus :—The King of Sardinia has professed to cede to the Emperor of the French the provinces of Chablais and Faucigny, in other words, he has professed to cede to the French Emperor the provinces which formed the neutralized boundary of Switzerland. It happens also that Switzerland was vitally injured by this arrangement, because whereas Switzerland formerly had an admirable frontier for the Canton of Geneva as the result of the Treaty of Turin, she finds herself surrounded on all sides but one by a great military empire, and ceases to be defensible. True, such defence as is given by a European guarantee still remains, but experience has shown that protection by diplomatic arrangement is of little avail unless it be combined with a strong military frontier and a warlike people. I have great pleasure in admitting that the second article of the Treaty of Turin acknowledges in distinct terms and in the fairest way the extent to which the contemplated arrangement was questionable on the part of the Powers of Europe, and also by Switzerland; accordingly the two articles of the treaty provide that France should come to an understanding with Europe generally and Switzerland. Now, Switzerland being the State aggrieved by the arrangement made between these two Powers, desired to appeal to Europe; and it did so happen that the treaty arrangements made in 1814 and 1815 at Aix-la-Chapelle constituted an apt tribunal to which an appeal in such a case might be addressed—for that treaty provided that in the event of either party feeling aggrieved a Conference of the Powers was to take place. It is extremely important to bear this in mind because it is this which constitutes the distinction between a Conference in the ordinary sense of the term, and that peculiar Conference to which Switzerland is appealing. It would be extremely anomalous and inconvenient that an ordinary Conference should take place without some antecedent basis as to which there is a probability that the Powers would agree. But this is not a Conference of voluntary Powers, but constitutes what I may truly call a Court of Tribunal, and summoned by Switzerland as one of the Powers which states herself aggrieved, and therefore she is entitled to be present. It seems to me of importance that this Conference should take place, because it is there, and there only, that negotiations can be effectually carried on. It is of the greatest importance that the Swiss Confederation, which from the beginning has shown high spirit, great sagacity, and a firm and unflinching reliance on the great Powers of Europe—it is of great importance that Switzerland, called to negotiate on a matter of vital importance to her, should be able to negotiate without seeming to abandon that reliance she has always shown on the support of the Powers of Europe. Moreover, it is admitted by all, and by none more fairly than by France, that the existing state of things must undergo some alteration in order to be placed in conformity with the public law of Europe; and it would be a scandal to Europe if it could be supposed that there was no tribunal competent to decide the question.

The most obvious objection to the conference no doubt is the danger that it might seem to give something like a recognition to the transaction appealed against; but I humbly apprehend that the basis on which the Conference will take place will not be the Treaty of Turin; it will be the 92nd Article of the definitive Treaty of 1815, combined with the fact that these provinces have been occupied by the Emperor of the French, and it will not proceed on the assumption that the treaty signed on the 24th of March was definitive. Now, it appears to me that this Conference, if it should succeed, will confer a very great blessing upon Europe; and if it should fail it will in that event also bring about a state of things far more desirable than that which now exists, because it will show, in the most emphatic manner, what will then be the recognized impossibility of placing the Treaty of Turin in conformity with the public law of Europe. I beg now to ask the question.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I have only one or two words to say to the noble Lord before he answers the question of my hon. and learned Friend. I do not wish to enter on the general subject, because I hope before the end of the Session it will be fully gone into. But, as the question of a Conference has now been decided, I only hope the noble Lord and the Powers of Europe, who have given their assent to it, will see that the rights of Switzerland, as a party vitally interested in this question, are fully recognized. Now, France has denied the rights of Switzerland in this matter. Over and over again France has asserted that Switzerland has nothing whatever to do with any arrangement that may be made between France on the one side and Sardinia on the other. But the Powers of Europe—Russia, Prussia, Austria, and England—have decided the contrary; and I must say the despatch of the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), of the 24th of April, which is among the papers laid on the table yesterday, is a most energetic recapitulation of the whole question—it is a most admirable and excellent despatch. I only hope the noble Lord will act up to the sentiments it contains. There is another observation I wish to make; it is this—France has denied that Switzerland has anything to do with this question. France has endeavoured to negotiate directly with Switzerland, but Switzerland very wisely refused to do anything with France apart from the other Powers. Now, France lays very great stress on this—she wishes it to be understood that the invitation or summons to attend the Conference comes from France, and not Switzerland. This is a most important fact—such is not the fact; the fact is perfectly the reverse. The invitation to this special Conference comes from Switzerland, not from France, and has been so recognized by the Powers of Europe. I hope France will not be allowed to take credit to herself for the assembling of this Conference. I have only to add that as France has declined to cede any portion of the neutralized province of Chablais and Faucigny, because she says that universal suffrage has given her those provinces, I can state that the whole operation of that universal suffrage was most false and fallacious. I am authorized to say this—that there are about 30,000 adults capable of exercising the elective franchise in those two provinces; I think that 29,000 voted in favour of France; but only a few weeks before, 12,000, the most important and responsible inhabitants of the very same provinces publicly and without any pressure declared themselves entirely in favour of union with Switzerland. Now, to tell us that you would not admit any diminution of that territory, because universal suffrage has given it to you, is, I say, a most false and fallacious doctrine, and I hope the Powers of Europe will not submit to the degradation of accepting such a position from France.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I have only one or two remarks to make on this occasion. I must say, after reading the despatch of the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) produced yesterday, and to which reference has already been made, I have every confidence in his administration of the foreign affairs of the country. I think we may leave the foreign affairs of England with the utmost confidence in the hands of the noble Lord. [MR. VINCENT SCULLY: Oh, oh!] That is my opinion. It may not be the opinion of the hon. Member for Cork; but I would rather be wrong with the noble Lord, than right with that hon. Gentleman. There was a very grave statement made last night—a statement unusually grave, because my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Kinglake) who made it, never speaks on light grounds, and his information has generally been found correct; any statement, therefore, which he makes is entitled to the fullest consideration of the House. My hon. and learned Friend stated that at the last interview which took place between the two Emperors at the conference of Villafranca, the Emperor Napoleon III. made a proposition to the Emperor of Austria to the effect that, on condition that the latter would join the former in an attack on the Rhenish Provinces, Lombardy should be secured to Austria.

Sir Robert Peel

MR. KINGLAKE: The condition was that Austria should acquiesce in that attack.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Well, acquiesce in it. I say that any such statement coming from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridgwater is worthy of the most serious attention of this House, because he evidently has means of obtaining information that are not available to other hon. Members. The question I therefore wish to put to the noble Lord is, whether he is aware that such a proposition was ever made? I am unable to judge of how my hon. and learned Friend acquired his knowledge, but he certainly was cognizant of the project for annexing Savoy to France long before it was known to any Member of Her Majesty's Government; and that is one reason why I put this question. I can only suppose that my hon. and learned Friend must have received his information from the Emperor of Austria himself, because I believe no one else but the two Emperors was present at the interview. I should imagine that if any person in this country could give a satisfactory answer to the House on this point it would be the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary. I therefore take the liberty of putting this question to him, at the same time repeating what I said at the outset—namely, that I have full confidence in the noble Lord's judgment in conducting our foreign affairs.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: With respect, first, to the questions put to me by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) I will state the facts as far as they are within my own knowledge. My hon. and learned Friend seems to suppose that certain Powers have consented to take part in the proposed Conference. Now, the way in which the matter stands is this. The House will have seen from the papers which have been presented that the French Government have proposed three different modes for reconciling the 92nd Article of the Treaty of Vienna with the 2nd Article of the Treaty of Turin, and that a Conference is only one of those modes. The French Government, therefore, have not summoned the Conference, and asked the other Powers to attend it, but they proposed it as one of these modes. Her Majesty's Government had no difficulty in immediately saying that they accepted the Conference as the best mode of considering this subject; but it does not appear, as far as we know, that any definitive answer has been given by the other Powers of Europe. We have been told—although, of course, the answer would not come to us, but to the French Government—that Austria and Prussia have both shown some hesitation on the matter; and that, although an unofficial answer went from Russia that she was willing to accept a Conference, yet her answer was not formal or definitive on the subject. Therefore at present no summonses have gone out from France for the purpose of convening the Conference; and it is not yet certain that the other Powers have assented to that mode. I believe, however, they all say that if a Conference is summoned they will send representatives to it.

With regard to the second question put to me, as to whether any preliminary arrangement has been come to with the Powers respecting the basis of a settlement, the French Government have from the beginning stated that the only practical basis is, that the Powers should endeavour to reconcile the 92nd Article of the Treaty of Vienna with the 2nd Article of the Treaty of Turin, and they assume that that will be thought a proper basis, because it allows every latitude to the other Powers to state their views upon the subject. I imagine no other basis than that can be proposed. As to the observation which has been made more than once in this House, that the French Government proposes to tie down the other Powers beforehand against any arrangement by which any part of Savoy may be separated from France, no attempt has been made to fetter the other Powers on that subject. The French Government, however, say that if such a proposal should be made, they will state their objections to its adoption.

With respect to the revelation made by my hon. and learned Friend last night as to what transpired between the Emperor of the French and the Emperor of Austria at Villafranca, what happened on that occasion can only have taken place between those two Sovereigns. I believe that no other person was present at their interview. We have had various accounts, more or less official, of the general substance of what passed at that interview; but we have not received any intimation that the proposal or suggestion to which my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Bernal Osborne) alludes, was made. I have, indeed, heard the story in a vague way, but I do not know that there is any authority whatever for it.

VOLUNTEERS IN IRELAND.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BRADY said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the answer given by the First Lord of the Treasury to a question put on Friday last, the 6th instant, relative to the enrolment of Volunteers in Ireland. The people of that country were now quite as loyal and as well-disposed towards the English Government as any other portion of the United Kingdom. If, unfortunately, any hostile descent should be made on our shores, the blow would, doubtless, be struck at England, and then Ireland would necessarily be denuded of troops, whose presence would be required at the part of our Empire which was most seriously menaced. In such a case Ireland would be left in a state of the greatest insecurity, because it would be impossible for her 20,000 men of the constabulary to afford her adequate protection. If a hostile force effected a landing in Ireland the people would be demoralized and the country thrown back a century in material prosperity and civilization. It was, therefore, the bounden duty of the Government to enable the Irish people to arm themselves, so that they might defend their homes in the hour of peril. The Queen's prize at Wimbledon was carried off by a Scotchman, but there was not a single Irishman among the competitors. He understood that the noble Lord at the head of the Government was himself a private in the brigade of Irish Volunteers raised in London, but the existence of that corps, instead of being a compliment, would be a stigma, unless the people of Ireland were allowed to raise similar corps in their own country. By the present system of legislation the people of Ireland were compelled to think that they would not be allowed to be loyal. The House sat till nearly four o'clock in order that a Coercion Bill might be introduced, but the Irish were not allowed to bear arms in order that they might defend their own property, the rights of the Crown, and the institutions of the country.

THE PAPER DUTY.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the Excise Duty on Paper, and in reference thereto, to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention to enforce the payment of that Duty? He had no desire to reopen questions that had been already fully discussed, or to add to the excitement which existed, or which might be expected to arise; but, on the contrary, he wished to point out a simple and obvious mode of allaying such excitement, and what ought to be still more the object of this House and the Government—to afford satisfaction to that conscientious alarm and anxiety which had been so fully expressed in petitions, and which he and others so earnestly felt. That course was to abstain from enforcing the payment of the paper duty until the question could be again brought forward in connection with the financial arrangements of next year. There appeared to him to be unanswerable arguments in favour of that course. In the first place, the honour of the Crown, represented in that House by the Minister, was pledged to repeal the paper duty, and this wholly apart from any question about the power of the House of Lords to reject the Bill sent up to them for that purpose; and not only so, but the Crown, with whom alone that House had to deal in the matter, had received the consideration for such repeal in the penny increase to the income tax. That was the distinct proposal made by the Government when the Budget was introduced, and it was further ratified in the most express terms on the discussion of the Motion of the hon. Member for Somersetshire. The words of the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, representing the Government and the Crown, believed and acted upon by him (Mr. Whalley), in his vote on that occasion, were as follows:—Speaking of the income tax, the right hon. Gentleman said—

“It has many vices, but it has one great virtue, which is this—that in the main, without any injustice in its general scope, without any of those idle dreams of plunder and confiscation which we have heard of to-night, it does make the property of the country subservient to the uses of the State, within limits which are safe, and for purposes which are beneficial. The position of the Government then, with respect to the paper duties, is this,—we think it part of our public duty, part of the pledge we gave to the country which has given such a general and warm support to our financial measures, that we should redeem the pledge which we gave a month ago—namely, that under the existing circumstances of the present year, we should ask for such a repeal of indirect taxation as should not exceed two millions of money. We desire the House to exercise an impartial judgment on the question, ‘What is the best mode of applying that sum?’ But for all the reasons I have stated, we submit that the wisest and most prudent choice we can make is to determine to repeal the paper duty, and to give freedom to a great branch of industry.”

Mr. Brady

Now, what could be more clear and explicit, and how would it be possible ever again to rely upon anything that emanated from the responsible advisers of the Crown, if this pledge, so distinctly reiterated, were to be now set at nought, and the paper duty exacted in addition to the penny income tax, which was given in consequence of that pledge? He was not surprised to hear that the Earl of Derby, when he resolved upon a course which thus involved a sacrifice of a pledge given in the name of the Crown, knew nothing of such pledge having been given; but he knew it then, and it could not be doubted that if time were allowed to retrace his course, his Lordship would, on that ground alone, if on no other, relieve, not that House, not the people of the country, but the Crown itself, from the extraordinary and altogether unprecedented position in which by his act it was placed. What he (Mr. Whalley) asked was that the Government should, to the extent of their discretion—and he would even appeal to their patriotism—keep faith with the House by not collecting, for the present year, at all events, this tax. There was, however, no difficulty or risk in adopting such a course. Nothing was more common than to allow Excise duties to remain uncollected, taking some security for the future payment if demanded. That was the invariable course when disputes or litigation arose; and they might rely upon it such litigation would arise, in a manner that would not admit of being trifled with—the momentous question of the right of the House of Lords to retain a tax which the Crown and the House of Commons had repudiated. It was to prevent such discussions, agitation, and excitement by an ordinary exercise of discretion on the part of the Government that he now appealed to them. There could be no greater mistake than to suppose that the reluctance of the people to enter into political agitation on the matter arose from indifference. The right hon. Member for Bucks had told them, and that truly, that the House had surrendered its privileges as to that £50,000,000 or £60,000,000 still raised from the trade and labour, as distinguished from the property of the country, and that not a shilling would be remitted without the consent of the House of Lords. Such was, beyond all doubt, the fact, and when the full consequences of that state of matters became understood, the remedies might as much exceed the present bounds of the constitution, as did the past and unrecognized surrender to this enormous extent, of the revenue of the country to the control of the House of Lords. His object was to avoid such questions—to deal simply with the fact which every one would understand, and which no one could question, that the honour of the Crown, the good faith of the Government, and the character of the House of Commons, all imperatively demanded that no more Excise duty on paper should be collected. And, as if to aid them in getting out of the difficulty, it appeared that, in fact, it was a duty that could not be collected under the law as it stood at present. That he regarded as a most fortunate circumstance, and one that he hoped the Government would take advantage of to avert the spread of irritation and excitement on this question. On the same occasion to which he had before referred, the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer told the House that it could not be collected under the existing law. He said—

“ There must be a new set of laws for enforcing this Excise, with a new set of restrictions on trade, and a new set of penalties to enforce them. All this must be done to enforce a duty which has been condemned two years ago by the unanimous vote of the House of Commons, and I want to know of my hon. Friend whether, as a practical and sensible man, he thinks it very likely any Government can be found to propose to carry such laws through the House of Commons ? ”

He (Mr. Whalley) had brought the matter forward with a view to find a way out of the difficulty, and to ascertain whether the Government might think fit to make on that occasion any declaration of their intentions. He entertained full confidence that the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer would sustain, by the course that he would take in the matter, the high, and, he might say, unparalleled reputation he had acquired, and justify the confidence which the country reposed in him.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Member for Peterborough, in calling attention to the Excise duty on paper, has asked whether it is the intention of the Government to enforce the payment of the duty. The question was grounded on the difficulties which the hon. Member thinks attend the execution of the law arising from the legal definition of “ paper.” All I can say is, that this is a very important matter for the consideration of the Legislature with respect to the duty on paper ; but I do not imagine that, on account of any apprehended difficulties in the execution of the law, the Government, whatever may be their opinion on the policy of retaining the paper duty, would be justified in pursuing any other course in collecting it than that adopted in collecting other Excise duties.

OUTRAGE IN TYRONE.

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if he has been informed that the Stained Glass Window of the Roman Catholic Church of Cookstown, county Tyrone, was maliciously broken on the morning of Sunday, the 1st day of July, and what practical steps have been taken by the Irish Government to maintain the peace and preserve the persons and property of Catholics from outrage in that and other Counties in Ulster ? He had stated on a former occasion that on the 15th of June a procession of 1,500 Orangemen marched into Cookstown, accompanied by a band of music, which played party and insulting tunes before the doors of the Roman Catholic inhabitants ; that the leaders of the procession threatened that they would return to Cookstown ; and that if they did so the Catholics, as a matter of course, would resist them, and the consequence would be bloodshed. The reply of the Chief Secretary was, that he had received no report, but afterwards the right hon. Gentleman showed him an official document, in which the affair was lightly treated. Since then, however, he had been informed that it was a formidable demonstration, and had excited bad feeling and apprehension in the minds of the Catholics of Cookstown. Moreover, some time in the night, between the 30th of June and the 1st of July, a splendid glass window in the new Roman Catholic Chapel in Cookstown, to which Protestants and Presbyterians had liberally subscribed, and which was erected in memory of a Roman Catholic clergyman, respected and honoured by all classes in the town, was smashed to pieces, and it was well known that the dastardly outrage was perpetrated either by those who shared in the demonstration of the 15th of June, or by persons who sympathized with them. He had received a letter from a Roman Catholic clergyman, in which it was stated that, so far from peace being restored in Cookstown, the whole country was in a terrible state of excitement and alarm; that 1,500 Orangemen marched into Stewartstown on the 2nd of July, and threatened destruction to the churches and chapels of the Catholics; that in a neighbouring town a band of Orangemen broke into a Catholic chapel, and smashed the tabernacle and a statue of the blessed Virgin; that Armagh was almost in a state of siege; and that if the Government did not act vigorously before the 12th, there would certainly be bloodshed on a large scale. The parish priest of Cookstown had clearly shown in a letter published in the Irish papers that the Catholics had given no provocation whatever, and the writer concluded by stating that his only hope was in public opinion compelling the Legislature to place Orangeism and Ribbonism on the same footing. A public meeting of the Catholic inhabitants of Cookstown had been held, and had passed resolutions to the effect that they believed it to be the plain duty of every Catholic to cultivate peaceable relations with all men, no matter what religion they might profess or what political views they might adopt; that the outrageous display of the Orangemen had excited the utmost indignation and alarm; and that it behoved the Government immediately to take steps to protect their persons, property, and churches. These outrages were not the consequence of the recurrence of any of those festivals which excited bad feelings in Ireland, but the persons who led the procession in Cookstown declared that there would be bloodshed by the 12th of July in that place. Were, then, confederacies like these to be tolerated in a civilized country? He was as strongly against Ribbonism as any man could be, but Ribbonism sprang from a spirit of antagonism, and the gauntlet was thrown down by Orangeism. He had been in the north of Ireland, and witnessed the deadly animosity which raged between the different religions, and he believed that if Orangeism and Ribbonism were utterly extirpated, Ireland would not only be the most pacific, but the most prosperous portion of the United Kingdom. His object in asking this question was peace, not hostility, and he therefore begged the earnest attention of Government to the matter.

Mr. Maguire

MR. CORRY said, that no one could deplore more than himself that such an outrage as that referred to should have taken place in a part of the country which he represented, but he must protest against the right of the hon. Member (Mr. Maguire) to argue from the fact that a single outrage had been committed (but which was more probably a disturbance originated by some drunken persons) that the lives and safety of all the Roman Catholics in that part of Ireland had been or were now endangered. But for the purpose of showing the House what the nature of the alleged outrage was he would read a letter he had received from Mr. Lindsay, the Chairman of the Petty Sessions, before whom the case itself was tried. That letter was in the following terms:—

“ My attention has been drawn to a Report which has been going the rounds of the public papers relative to a statement attributed to Mr. Maguire, M.P. for Dungarvan, in which he is reported to have stated in his place in the House of Commons.”

[Cries of “ Order.”] Well, he would say, a statement was made,—

“ That a large number of persons stating themselves, and known as Orangemen, and amounting to at least 1,000 in number, marched in procession into the town of Cookstown, county of Tyrone, on the evening of the 15th instant, accompanied by drums and fifes, and playing party tunes, and that they continued for a period of three hours, from eight until eleven o’clock, parading the streets of the town, playing such party tunes, and frequently stopping before the houses of the Roman Catholic inhabitants to beat their drums, and indulge in various insulting manifestations, calculated to lead to a breach of the peace.”

Now, his correspondent observed,—

“ As Chairman of the Cookstown Petty Sessions, held on the following Friday, the 19th instant, when seventeen of the persons alluded to appeared on summons before the Court for having beaten drums and played on fifes in Cookstown on the evening in question, I beg leave to state that the information which Mr. Maguire has received touching this matter is altogether incorrect. It appeared in evidence that there was no marching in procession, no party tunes were played, no insulting manifestations exhibited before the houses of the Roman Catholic inhabitants, nor any abusive or provoking language made use of towards any one, and I need therefore scarcely add, that there was no breach of the peace whatever. Had there been such a procession and display as Mr. Maguire is reported to have stated in the House of Commons, I should have felt it my duty to have directed informations to have been taken and returned to the ensuing assizes; but it was not even attempted to be proved that there was anything political in the assembly, or of what party they consisted, nor was the word 'Orange,' or 'Orangemen' ever made use of by any one of the witnesses during the trial. I am since informed that there were a number of women and children, as well as men in the crowd, many of whom were persons returning from a spinning manufactory in the neighbourhood of Cookstown. As I am not, and never was, an Orangeman, I cannot justly be accused of partiality in this statement, which I feel it my duty (as Chairman of these Petty Sessions, as well as in compliance with the wishes of other magistrates) to make to you, as one of our representatives of this county of Tyrone, that you may be fully aware of the facts which Mr. Maguire seems to have been totally ignorant of."

It appeared, then, from that communication, that the procession was a noisy collection of men and women and children, but no breach of the peace had been committed; it was not even shown that it was formed of any particular class of religionists, or that that was at all any prominent feature in the affair. Even the classic atmosphere of Rome had not been sufficient to restrain the ebullitions of lively feeling natural to Irishmen, as his Holiness the Pope had no doubt by this time discovered, with respect to the force that had tendered their services to him. Why, then, should it be expected that Cookstown was to be more free from a similar exhibition?

MARRIAGE IN THE PREVENTIVE SERVICE (SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

MR. BLACK said, that having on a previous occasion put a question to the Secretary to the Treasury, in consequence of a person of excellent character being dismissed from the Preventive Service, in the department of the Excise in Scotland, because he was married, and not having received a satisfactory answer, he wished again to put a question to the Secretary to the Treasury in reference to the treatment of the men of the Preventive Service in the Department of the Excise in Scotland, in preventing them from getting married; whether those regulations were placed in the hands of the men when they joined the service; and whether it was the opinion of the Lords of the Treasury that such regulations ought to be maintained?

THE GALWAY PACKET CONTRACT. QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in rising to put a Question as to the present state of the Negotiation which has lately been carried on for the transfer of the Galway Packet Contract to the Montreal and Ocean Steam Navigation Company, said he had no wish to bring on a general discussion on this subject, but merely wished to set right certain misrepresentations which had appeared in the public papers, and which were, perhaps, confirmed to some extent by the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the previous night. He would appeal to the Government not to act hastily in this matter, and not to excite any prejudice against the proposed transfer before the question was brought before the House. Hitherto the decision of the Government had been adverse to the transfer of the contract. Now, from the statements in the newspapers, as well as from those made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the public might imagine that the transaction was one which had been suddenly entered into; that it was, in fact, a proposal made by the Galway Company, finding themselves in difficulties, to get rid of their contract to another Company; that the subject had been brought before the Government without previous notice, and that, not being afforded sufficient time to consider it, the Government felt obliged to refuse their sanction to the arrangement. That was by no means the real state of the case. In the first place, it was not a question between one company and another, but between the Galway Packet Company and the Provincial Government of Canada. In the next place, it did not originate with the Galway Company, but it arose out of a suggestion made by a rather high extra-official authority, Mr. Cobden, Chairman of the Packet Contract Committee, last Session. Then, again, it had not been brought forward at the last moment, but had been, more or less, under discussion ever since August or September last. Nor had it been pressed suddenly upon the notice of the Government for any purposes of the Company. It was a negotiation carried on between the Company and the representatives of the Canadian Government deliberately, and, as was understood, with the cognizance and sanction of the Home Government; the reason why an early decision was desired from the Home Government being that the representatives of the Canadian Government were anxious to go back by the mail of Wednesday last. The Company themselves were not in any hurry for an answer; they were prepared to wait until the 1st of August. The representatives of the Canadian Government were Mr. Galt, Finance Minister, and Mr. Smythe, Postmaster General; and it would be obvious that two such functionaries could not conveniently be absent from the colony for any length of time, especially at the period of the Prince of Wales's visit, and during the September elections. It was with a view to consult the convenience of these gentlemen and of the province that the Government were pressed for a speedy answer. The facts as regarded the Canadian Ministry were these:—After the Galway Contract had been sanctioned by the late Government, it was brought to the notice of the Packet Contract Committee that great injury had thereby been inflicted on Canada, because the Canadians, finding it necessary for their own purposes to maintain and subsidize a line of steamers between the two countries, now found a new competitor in the field, so that their steamers were running under great disadvantage. They were then subsidizing their steamers with £50,000 a year, recently increased to upwards of £100,000, and they were naturally annoyed therefore at the rivalry of a company subsidized by the mother country. At the close of last Session, this state of facts having been brought to the notice of the Packet Committee, Mr. Cobden suggested to the Representative of Canada, the Minister of Public Works, who was examined before the Committee, that some arrangement might possibly be made between the Galway Packet Company and the Canadian Government. Communications were accordingly entered into, in the course of September and October last, with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Colonial Secretary, in order to ascertain whether, in the event of such an arrangement being concluded, it would receive the sanction of the Government. The reply was that the subject was before a Select Committee, and that it was impossible for the Government to take it up until the Report of that Committee had been made. The negotiation accordingly fell through. The Select Committee took a good deal of evidence on the subject and made their Report. They did not go the length of recommending a transfer of the contract, but they mentioned it in rather favourable terms. He understood that immediately after the Report was published, possibly before negotiations were resumed, Mr.

Sir Stafford Northcote

Galt and Mr. Smythe came over with a view to purchase the contract from the company; and it was arranged at last that the Canadian Government should pay the company a subsidy of £35,000 a year, the company assigning to them the contracts for the conveyance of the mails between Galway and Boston and New York. Of course this was made subject to the approval of the Government, and the intention was that the mails should be carried to a Canadian instead of an American port. These terms being agreed upon, as the company and the Colonial Government understood, with the cognizance and the approval of the Treasury and the Post Office, the agreement was formally reduced into writing, and signed by the representatives of the company, and by Mr. Galt and Mr. Smythe on the part of the colony. All these facts were notified to the Treasury, and, though they might not have been brought personally under the notice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they were so far within the cognizance of the Treasury that an official letter was written to the Post Office mentioning this proposal, and the Post Office accordingly communicated to the company that, instead of the mails being sent on the next occasion by the Connaught, a Galway boat, they would be transferred to the North Briton, belonging to the company subsidized by the Canadian Government. That notice was also published by the Post Office in the form of an official advertisement, and was therefore recognized by them in the most complete way on the authority of the Treasury letter. The parties were thus led to believe, not without reason, that the proposed transfer was sanctioned by the Government so far as it could be sanctioned. They were aware that the Government could authorize nothing but the transfer of the subsidy, the subsidy itself being contingent on the vote of this House, and all they wished was to understand whether the Government had any objection to the transfer. Of course the arrangement would be very advantageous to the Canadian Government. They now paid a subsidy of £104,000 a year, and if they paid the Galway Company £35,000 a year, deducting from those sums £78,000, the amount given by the Home Government, their expenditure would be materially reduced. He would not go into the merits of the case as regarded the bargain with the Galway Company, but it was not so unreasonable as the public press seemed to consider.

The Galway Company had incurred large expenses in the establishment of this line; and, having established it and taken steps to give Ireland a permanent packet port, they wished to diminish the losses they had sustained by handing over the mails to the Canadian Government, which would secure the interests of the colony, as well as the interests of Ireland. Considerable consternation had therefore been excited by the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Government at the last moment had altogether refused their sanction to this agreement. He did not ask on the present occasion for any pledge. He only hoped that the Government would not take any final step in the matter before the House had had an opportunity of considering it; and, following up the hint of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the previous night, he would ask whether his right hon. Friend was aware that Mr. Galt and Mr. Smythe had deferred their departure till the following Wednesday, whether there had been any communication with them, and whether the question was still considered an open one?

MR. BAXTER said, he wished to express an earnest hope that, whatever decision the Government might come to on the Galway contract, they would not sanction the assignment of the contract to the Montreal Ocean Steam Navigation Company. The House was aware that the late Government gave a subsidy of £78,000 a year for seven years to the Galway Company, and that the purchase money paid for this contract by the Montreal Company was to be £35,000 a year for seven years. That was an admission that the service might have been performed for a less sum by £35,000 than the subsidy agreed to be paid. Mr. Lever, as the House would see by the evidence, came before the Committee and told them that the service between Galway and the United States could not be performed either by the screw steamers of the Liverpool and Philadelphia Company, or by those belonging to the Montreal Ocean Steam Navigation Company. It was also stated that four vessels of large tonnage and increased power were being built by the Galway Company, and would be placed on the station in the course of the year, in order to perform the service in a more regular and rapid manner than it had hitherto been done. It now turned out that these ships were not to be placed on the station, and that the service was to be performed by those very screw steamers of the Montreal Company which Mr. Lever declared to be inefficient to carry it out. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was probably not aware that the Montreal Ocean Steam Ship Company had recently lost three of their best ships, and that they were building new vessels to supply that loss. It would be a most extraordinary course for the Government or that House to take, if they sanctioned the assignment of a contract from one company to another, without insisting on the main conditions of that contract being performed. Whatever course the Government might feel disposed to take with regard to the vote, he did trust they would not sanction an assignment which had excited a feeling of astonishment, if not of indignation, amongst all those concerned in the steam navigation of this country.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he did not intend to inter into the merits of this case, and he regretted that the hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) had brought on a premature discussion instead of postponing it until the Vote was laid upon the table. But, although the hon. Baronet declared he would not say a word on the merits of the contract, he never heard a speech more dexterously put together to defend the course taken by the late Government. He (Sir Francis Baring) only hoped that the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not come to any decision until the House had had an opportunity of discussing the subject. The Select Committee had indirectly recommended that the Vote should be laid on the table for the decision of the House. He admitted that the question was not an easy one to decide, but the contract ought to be discussed on its own merits. Above all, no new contract ought be made that would produce an additional complication. He wished also to state that Mr. Cobden's communications were made previous to the Committee coming to a decision, and before the main part of the evidence was taken. One of the recommendations of the Committee was that no contract should be disposed of until the House had had a certain time given for considering its terms. If hon. Members would read a letter in the newspapers of the previous day they would find that certain agreements had been come to between the old contracting party and the new that might entirely change the contract. By the original contract between the Government and the Galway Company it was agreed that if the contemplated improvements in Galway Harbour were not made, or turned out ill, it was in the power of the parties either to insist on the improvements being carried out, or to remove the packets to some other Irish port; but a private stipulation was now made between the two contracting parties that to Galway in any case the ships should go. He believed that a Bill was now before Parliament enabling certain local parties to make improvements in Galway Harbour. These parties, it might be assumed, would carry out the improvements if in the event of their failure to do so the packets might be removed, but as soon as this stipulation came into force these parties might say, "You are bound to run your ships to Galway under any circumstances, and we would rather that some one else should pay for any improvements in the harbour." He wished to press the Government so far to respect the recommendation of the Select Committee as to wait until they had given the House an opportunity of discussing the circumstances of this contract.

MR. LAING said, he was glad to have an opportunity of explaining the precise state of the negotiations with the representatives of the Canadian Government relative to the transfer in question, which he thought had not as yet been quite understood. It was quite true, as the hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) had stated, that the general idea of the fusion of the Galway with the Canadian line was by no means new. It was quite true that it originated in a suggestion of Mr. Cobden, and was canvassed last Session in the Committee. Many hon. Members felt that a hardship had been done to Canada by the arrangement originally come to, and that it was very desirable the hardship should be remedied. The matter was repeatedly under discussion, and a division took place in the Committee on the subject. His own opinion as an individual Member was that there would be a propriety and advantage in such an arrangement if it could be settled on fair terms. It was, however, incorrect to suppose that the precise arrangement by which the fusion was intended to be carried out had been long under the consideration of the Government. In fact, the arrangement in question came upon the Government by surprise on the previous Wednesday. The original arrangement having fallen to the ground, there was no question of its revival for several months. Two Canadian ministers, Mr. Galt and Mr. Smythe, however, having arrived in this country, the negotiations were renewed. The matter had to go through several stages before it was ripe for the decision of the Government. It was first necessary for the parties to come to terms, and then a convention was necessary with Canada to regulate the terms of the service. Without a convention of that kind the purchase of the Galway contract by the Canadian Company was useless, because the British Government had to give its sanction to the substitution of the ports of Quebec and Portland for the ports of New York and Boston, originally named in the contract. The whole question of the arrangements to be entered into between the Canadian Company and the British Government having been in the first instance only casually broached in conversation, it was deemed necessary that the proposal which was made on behalf of the former should, in order to give effect to any assignment of the Galway contract, be reduced to writing. Under these circumstances he had had a conference with Mr. Galt and Mr. Smythe, the two gentlemen who represented Canada in this country, and had stated to them that, while individually favourable to the principle of the contemplated transfer, if it could be carried into effect, he had no sort of authority to bind the Government in the matter, and that he could not undertake to procure their decision until the terms of the transfer had in writing been duly submitted to their consideration. He had added that he would render all the assistance in his power in getting rid of mere matters of detail, and in the endeavour to frame a definite proposition on the subject. Such was the state of things on Tuesday, and on Wednesday the terms of the transfer were to have been reduced to writing; but, to his great surprise, he had on that day received a letter, stating that Mr. Galt and Mr. Smythe were obliged to take their departure for Canada that very night or the following morning; that they were not in a position to leave anybody behind them with power to represent them in the transaction in question; and that, under the circumstances, unless they had the distinct confirmation upon the part of the Government of the arrangement which they had proposed, the whole affair must fall to the ground. The letter conveying that intelligence had reached him on the afternoon of Wednesday, when the House was engaged in discussing the Census Bill. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was confined to his house by indisposition, and could not be seen, while the noble Lord at the head of the Government was detained in the House till six o'clock. A Cabinet meeting had then to be held, at which important matters were coming on for discussion. The noble Lord, however, made an appointment to meet the two Canadian representatives on the rising of the House, and it was under those circumstances, and with only a few minutes for consideration, that the Government were asked to sanction an arrangement not free from difficulty, and calculated to excite much discussion and opposition in Parliament. That being the state of things, the Government had taken the only course which, in his opinion, was open to them, and—the representatives of Canada having stated their inability to allow any further time for deliberation—intimated that they did not see their way to an approval of the arrangement. Since then, however, Mr. Galt and Mr. Smythe, thinking that a strong feeling of disappointment might be experienced in Canada if matters were left in their present unsettled state, had decided upon staying a week longer in this country. Official application had also, he believed, been made to have their proposal dealt with with the least possible delay, and under those circumstances it was, he thought, desirable that he should abstain from entering into the merits of the question. There were two propositions pending the decision of the Government and of the House; because he took it for granted that whatever might be done by the Government would only be done subject to the decision of the House upon it, which must be invited in the course of a few days, or a week or two at the furthest, when the question of the Galway contract was brought before them. A good deal had been advanced on both sides with regard to the price of the vessels, the time of their sailing, and other matters on which he should like to make an observation; but he thought it would be better, under the circumstances, to abstain from doing so. There was only one point to which he would refer—the interference of the Post Office with regard to the sailing of the Connaught. The circumstances were these. The assignment being made, the two parties had come to the Treasury, and stated that they had made an agreement for the sailing of the two vessels, the Connaught and the North Briton, and that it would be a great convenience to them to allow them to go. That permission was given in a letter distinctly stating that it was without prejudice to the entire arrangement; but on the present occasion he would not further enter into the merits of the question.

Sir Francis Baring

In answer to the question which had been put by his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Black) with reference to the regulations by which men engaged in the Inland Revenue Department in Scotland were precluded from marrying while in the service, he could only repeat what he had stated on a former occasion, upon the authority of the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, that although there was no positive rule on the subject, it was found from practical experience that unmarried were more efficient than married men in wild and exposed parts of the country. He might add that his hon. Friend appeared to him to labour under a mistaken impression in supposing that to the circumstance of unmarried men being preferred for such service was to be attributed the immorality which he said prevailed in Scotland, as evinced by the large number of illegitimate births, and for which he seemed to imagine the Lords of the Treasury were responsible. He had been informed that the reorganization of the preventive force in Scotland was under the notice of the Board of Inland Revenue, and that, while dealing with that question, it proposed to consider how far it was necessary to employ in it unmarried men exclusively.

MR. HALIBURTON, who was very imperfectly heard, said, that as far as he understood the question of the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford, its object was that no hasty decision should be come to by the Government on the subject, and that, if there was any inclination to refuse the application of the two Companies, they should keep that inclination in abeyance till they had given the question further consideration. In that request he cordially concurred. The subject was one of great interest to him, for he was the first to propose the carriage of the mails between England and America by steam. About the time when Dr. Lardner pronounced that the crossing of the Atlantic by steam was impossible, and long before the contract was made with Mr. Cunard, he went down to Bristol, and there he saw the managers of a company, who were about to send out the Great Western and other vessels of a like class ; and he urged them to enter into a contract with the Government to carry the mails across the Atlantic. They entertained a different opinion from him, and the whole matter fell to the ground at that time. Mr. Cunard, however, promptly took up the subject, and had ever since carried out his contract beneficially to the country and honourably to himself. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), who had spoken that evening, had, he believed, once made a voyage in one of Mr. Cunard's steamers across the Atlantic, and, like most hon. Gentlemen who had made a similar flight, fancied he had mastered the whole subject. Now, he, who had, in all probability, been more frequently across the Atlantic than any—with the exception, perhaps, of the naval—Members of that House, could inform the hon. Gentleman that the mails could not with certainty and security to human life be conveyed along that route without a subsidy. The American Government had tried a subsidy nearly twice as large as that which Mr. Cunard received, and failed in their object. It was only that very day, indeed, that he learned from the newspapers that a Mr. Vanderbilt, or whatever his name might be, had given to the American Government notice that he would carry no more mails for them. He spoke under the correction of hon. Gentlemen who knew more of mercantile matters than he did ; but there was not, so far as he was aware, a single line across the Atlantic at the present moment which was paying anything like a decent dividend to the shareholders. A great mistake had, in his opinion, been in the first instance made in permitting companies to convey the mails in goods-carrying ships. If vessels were constructed well, and only with the view of taking the mails and a limited number of passengers, the voyage across the Atlantic might, he thought, be performed in two or three days less than was now the case. In the arrangement which was made with the Cunard Company, the Government had in view the advantage of that sea-going fleet in the event of war. They were required to be built in a certain way, they were subject to inspection, and were to be given up to the Government in case of a sudden emergency. The benefit of these stipulations had been found some time since, when several of these noble steamers were taken off the line and handed over to the Government. Those who were acquainted with the fact knew that great disasters would have occurred if this had not been the case. These vessels were faster than any man-of-war. There was no man-of-war in the service that could compete with them for speed. Their accommodation, too, was very great, fit for the transport both of troops and horses. On one occasion one of these vessels was loading at Liverpool for her ordinary service ; she was required for the transport service ; she was taken off the station, handed over to the Government, the passengers who had taken their berths receiving compensation, and sent off at once to the Crimea. The discipline on board these ships was very conspicuous, as compared with that on the Collins' line. There were excellent officers, and an excellent code of regulations for their government. None of the officers were ever allowed to have anything to do with the passengers—not that they were unfit to associate with them, but that it was felt not consistent with the economy of the ship to allow the officers who were entrusted with the lives and properties of the passengers to come in contact with them. They had separate state and messrooms, with their own servants devoted to them. In the event of danger every man was told off and put in his place, and the marvellous success of that line was such that they could now calculate on the arrival of the American mail with as much certainty as on the mail from Edinburgh. He looked for his letters every Monday morning at ten o'clock, and there was less irregularity than there was in the arrival of the train from Windsor, which often kept him waiting half-an-hour. These were considerations which should not be thrown on one side in consequence of a mere assertion that the arrangement cost too much, and that the mails could be carried for the mere cost of postage. He thought there was a mistake certainly in the origin of the Galway arrangement if the Government thought they were doing much more than opening the resources of Ireland, and developing her agricultural and commercial advantages. It was out of the question to suppose that any man leaving London would go to Holyhead, cross the Irish Channel to Dublin, then make his way to the port of Galway, and, with every inconvenience of embarkation, take passage in an inferior steamer, when in four hours he could be on board a large steamer at Liverpool. It never could be supposed that Galway could compete with Liverpool, backed by the great manufacturing towns. The arrangement was beneficial to Ireland, no doubt, and he hoped it might be continued; but it was a great mistake to suppose that Galway could compete with Liverpool. There was another mistake—the points of debarkation. Nobody but an Irishman would have thought of going to New York and taking away emigrants from our own Colonies. He thought Canada had been hardly used in this matter hitherto. It was true she had no river outlet but the St. Lawrence, which was frozen for several months in the year; but the railway communication, that was now opening up communications between Quebec and Halifax, would overcome that difficulty. He trusted, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take a very large view of this subject. Considering the claims of Canada, it would be well worth while to postpone any adverse decision until the whole matter could be laid before Parliament.

Mr. Haliburton

MR. HENNESSY said, he would venture to inform the Chancellor of the Exchequer that a very strong feeling existed on the subject in Ireland. There was but one impression, and that was in favour of the transfer. They had carefully considered the whole circumstances of the case, and he earnestly hoped the Government would adopt the wise and sound suggestion of Mr. Cobden, than whom no person was better qualified to give an opinion on this matter.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I wish to say one word about the Galway contract in confirmation of what has been stated by my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury. The fact is, that on Wednesday, between five and six o'clock, I was told that certain gentlemen with whom I had made an appointment were at the Treasury ready to meet me. I went there, and they put into my hands a written statement of the conditions upon which they proposed that the contract should be transferred from the Galway Company to the Canadian Company. They said, at the same time, that they were going off either that evening or next morning, and that the decision of the Government must be given then and there upon the spot. I went to my Colleagues, then assembled in the Cabinet, and we took that decision which any reasonable man would take in similar circumstances. If a man is called upon on the sudden to give a decision, "Aye" or "No," upon a complicated question involving important considerations, he will,

of course, if he is obliged to say "Aye" or "No," say "No," because "No" leaves time for consideration, while "Aye" implies an immediate engagement, the effects of which it may be impossible to foresee. Therefore the only answer we believed we could give was that, under the circumstances, we could not give the assent necessary for transferring the contract from one party to the other.

OUTRAGE IN TYRONE.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he hoped the House would bear with him for a few moments while he referred to the serious charges which the hon. Member for Dungarvan had brought against his constituents in Tyrone. The hon. Member had talked as if the people of Tyrone were a set of men who disregarded the law, and were in the habit of committing the most outrageous crimes; but the fact was the hon. Gentleman, for whom he entertained the highest respect, had allowed himself to be made the mouthpiece of a few busybodies and mischiefmakers. In the county of Tyrone the great majority of the police were Roman Catholics. The county inspector of police and the clerk of the Crown were also Roman Catholics, and he asked whether the hon. Member was justified in casting aspersions on those respectable gentlemen, as if they had been guilty of neglecting their duty. The case which had been referred to gave him an opportunity of testifying to the character of the population which he represented, and which he maintained was among the most peaceful and loyal in the three kingdoms. A few years ago a Roman Catholic priest, whose piety and virtues had obtained for him universal admiration in that part of the county, died. The Roman Catholics were at the time preparing to erect a beautiful structure for Divine worship, and the Presbyterians and members of the Established Church, in large numbers came forward and begged to be permitted to testify their respect for the deceased Roman Catholic priest by contributing to the expense of placing a painted glass window in the building to his memory. The offer was accepted by the Roman Catholic building committee; but some time ago a ruffian broke the window at night, with a stick apparently. What was the consequence? The leading Protestants of the neighbourhood invited all parties to unite and testify their indignation publicly at the act. The result was that all the leading Protestants, both Presbyterian and Episcopalian, came forward and put down their names for large sums for the purpose of bringing to justice the miscreant who committed the act of destruction. This was the case which his hon. Friend, misled by a restless busy-body who for twenty years had been the cause of all the bad feeling about the place, brought before the House, and asked what had been done by the Government to protect the persons and property of Roman Catholics from outrage. It was not fitting that the hon. Gentleman, allowing his feelings to be carried away, should make such ex parte statements, and he (Lord Claud Hamilton) only discharged his duty in now coming forward to vindicate his constituents.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the particular outrage referred to was not at the time considered by the police of sufficient importance to be made the subject of a Special Report, but in consequence of his attention being called to the circumstance by the hon. Member for Dungarvan, an inquiry had been instituted respecting it. According to the Official Report, it appeared that on the night of the 30th of June a pane in the painted window at Cookstown, erected to the memory of the late parish priest, had been wilfully broken by some evil-disposed person or persons yet unknown. A head constable with twenty constables had been sent to the place, and there had been since no complaint of any additional disturbance. With regard to the rest of Ulster, precautions had been taken by the despatch of detachments of troops to preserve tranquillity, as at the present period of the year it was a matter of anxiety with the Irish Government to maintain the peace of the country. He was glad to say that he received intelligence which led him to hope that the day of anxiety had passed over without evil consequences.

Motion agreed to.

House at its rising to adjourn till Monday next.

WAR WITH CHINA.—RESOLUTION.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE rose pursuant to notice to move,

“That in order to remove one great obstacle
Lord Claud Hamilton

to Peace with China, the British Plenipotentiary be instructed not to insist on the fulfilment of the third Article of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, by which His Majesty the Emperor of China agrees that the Ambassador, Minister, or other Diplomatic Agent appointed by Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, may reside, with his family and establishment, permanently at the capital, or may visit it occasionally, at the option of the British Government.”

He regretted that his Motion had been postponed to so late an hour that he feared he would scarcely be able to do justice to it. He would however simply confine himself to facts. He was perfectly convinced, and all those who had studied the Chinese question would agree with him, that if we continued to insist on the third article of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, which required a resident Ambassador at Pekin, it would not be a question merely of six or nine millions of money. This country would never remain at peace with China, for no sooner would peace be concluded than circumstances would occur to renew the war. Thus the trade and commerce of the country would be crippled for an object the value of which he could not understand, and which he thought we could only insist on now for the gratification of the national pride—he had almost said of the national vanity. The question was of such importance that it might well claim the full attention of the House. It was important on account of its magnitude, the difficulties by which it was surrounded, and the injustice with which, as he contended, we had treated the Chinese people. The Vote which had been moved showed the magnitude of the question, but that £3,800,000 by no means represented the entire amount which would be required during the present year. He firmly believed (and he had had communications with gentlemen out there)—he believed on excellent authority, that if the war were to go on, there would be a deficit of £6,000,000 more at the conclusion of the present financial year. An army stationed 1,500 miles from their supplies, in the Gulf of Petcheli, blocked up by ice in the winter and by mud in the summer—an army under such circumstances composed of French, English, Bengalese, Coolies, Sikhs, and Lascars, would have difficulties both of climate and country to contend with to afford abundant grounds for alarm. These difficulties a very great military authority considered sufficiently alarming to deter England from entering upon such a war. He had a curious passage, written by the late Emperor Napoleon while at St. Helena, in which he discussed the possibility of a China war, and he said,

“I cannot imagine that any English Government would ever be mad enough to enter upon a war with a nation situated as China, for such a war could never be brought to a satisfactory conclusion, but must necessarily be attended with enormous sacrifices of blood and treasure.”

Then, with regard to the injustice of the war. It was lamentable as well as instructive to look back to the debates of 1840 upon the China war in which we were then engaged. At that time, now twenty years ago, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), in a speech of powerful eloquence, and in a Motion admirably worded, pointed out the dangers the Government was incurring, and told the House that not for the next ten years, or twenty or thirty years, could we hope to have permanent peace with China if we embarked in that war. The right hon. Baronet was confirmed by many high authorities at the time, but nevertheless that opium war, which he considered a most unjust war, was begun. And what had been the result? To bring down the narrative to the treaty of Tien-tsin, he would merely revert to what had taken place. First, there was the Pottinger treaty, under which we had exacted 21,000,000 dollars as an indemnity, which was paid—and how paid? By taking silver out of the private houses of the Chinese people, the Government of China not having sufficient means at its disposal. Further, we demanded, and obtained permission to establish settlements and appoint consuls in five ports—namely, Hong Kong, Amoy, Ningpo, Foo-choo-Foo, and Shanghai. Subsequently Sir John Bowring brought us into another and if possible a still more unjust war—the war of the lorcha. The question of the lorcha was the ground put forward as the cause of that war; but the demand of Sir John Bowring to enter Canton in full uniform was the chief cause of that war; and though such an avowal of opinion rendered a man unpopular, and had lost him a seat for Lanarkshire, he must express his deliberate conviction that that war also was unjustly undertaken. And what was the result? We gained admission to Canton—we attacked the people and bombarded the city—and in the end a treaty of peace was signed. That brought him to the present war, and the extraordinary conditions now demanded. Mark how increasing had been our demands. At every fresh occasion the demand was greater. The jealousy and fears of the Chinese Government and people were excited, and as the right hon. Baronet had eloquently said, in 1840, when the Chinese nation looked across the Himalaya mountains, they might well tremble when they saw a great power like England, whose province India had become, ever making fresh demands. The Earl of Clarendon, in his instructions to the Earl of Elgin, told him to insist upon a resident minister at Peking. But the Earl of Elgin saw the danger of making such a demand, and, therefore, when first he negotiated with the Chinese Government, he only demanded the execution at Canton of all treaty engagements, including the admission of British subjects to that city, and compensation for losses sustained by British subjects in consequence of the disturbances. Such was the state of the case at the commencement of the negotiation. But shortly afterwards the Earl of Elgin increased his demands; and all of a sudden insisted upon the right which formed the third Article of the Treaty of Tien-Tsin, of having a resident British Minister at Peking. The Earl of Elgin did that in direct opposition to the advice of Count Pontiatine, the Russian Minister, and he believed also in opposition to the advice of the American Minister. How repugnant that was to the feelings and prejudices of the Chinese would be evident to every hon. Gentleman who would take the trouble to look through the blue-book on the table. He might quote page after page of earnest entreaty from the Minister appointed to negotiate on the part of the Emperor that we should not insist on that article of the treaty. The Minister pointed out to the Earl of Elgin the total ruin it would be to the Chinese Government if a resident foreign Minister was admitted to Peking; he showed the insecurity that must accompany such a proceeding, that it was quite impossible the Government could be answerable for the safety or even the life of the ambassador, and that his residence there would be sure to give rise to serious disturbances, for which they would be blamed. Those representations made an impression on the mind of the Earl of Elgin, and he wrote to the Earl of Malmesbury:—

“The concessions obtained in it from the Chinese Government are not in themselves extravagant, nor, with the exception of the important principle of extritoriality, in excess of those which commercial nations are wont freely to grant to each other, but in the eyes of the Chinese Government they amount to a revolution, and involve the surrender of some of the most cherished principles of the traditional policy of the empire. They have been extorted, therefore, from its fears. These concessions, moreover, thus extorted from the fears of the Chinese Government by British and French power, are not, in point of fact, extorted from it for the benefit of British and French subjects exclusively. Under the guarantee of most favoured nation clauses and other pretences not always so intelligible, they will, no doubt, be claimed and exercised very generally by the subjects and citizens of other Occidental nations."

To insist on conditions so repugnant to the feelings of a people which our own ambassador told us were only extorted from their fears, was to declare that we would continue in a state of perpetual warfare with China. In another of the Earl of Elgin's despatches he pointed out again that the Chinese considered that the condition, if insisted on, would result in the total overthrow of their empire. In a letter containing an appeal from one of the Imperial Commissioners to the Earl of Elgin in which he said :—

"Inasmuch as in the treaty of peace concluded between our two nations, it is laid down that the British Minister shall either reside in permanence at the capital, or visit it occasionally, at the option of the British Government, such being the plain language of the article, it must, doubtless, be abided by; and if it be the fixed purpose of your Excellency's government that the residence (of the Minister) shall be permanent, China cannot, of course, gainsay this. The established reputation of your Excellency for justice and straightforwardness, for kind intentions and friendly feeling, make us place the fullest confidence in your assurance that when you exacted the condition referred to, you were actuated by no desire whatever to do injury to China. The permanent residence of foreign Ministers at the capital would, notwithstanding, be an injury to China in many more ways than we can find words to express. In sum, in the present critical and troublous state of our country, this incident would generate, we fear, a loss of respect for their Government in the eyes of her people; and that this would, indeed, be no slight evil it will not be necessary, we assume, to explain to your Excellency with greater detail. It is for this reason that we specially address you a second letter on this subject, and we trust that your Excellency will represent for us to Her Majesty your Sovereign the great inconvenience you feel (the exercise of the right would be) to our country, and beseech her not to decide in favour of the permanent residence at Peking."

In all these communications they might observe the clearest evidence that the Chinese Commissioners were telling the truth. He now came to the Earl of Elgin's decision, in which he yielded the point, and that was important. He says, writing to the Commissioners :—

"The proposal has been attentively considered by the undersigned; and he now begs to state that although he is resolved by no act or word to abate one tittle of the rights secured to his Government by treaty, it is his wish, so far as such a course is consistent with his duty, to endeavour to reconcile due consideration of the feelings of the Chinese Government with the satisfaction of the rights of his own. He is prepared, consequently, on viewing the whole of the circumstances before him, at once to communicate to Her Majesty's Government the representations that have been addressed to him by their Excellencies the Imperial Commissioners upon this important question; and humbly to submit it as his opinion that if Her Majesty's Ambassador be properly received at Peking when the ratifications are exchanged next year, and full effect given in all other particulars to the treaty negotiated at Tientsin, it would certainly be expedient that Her Majesty's representative in China should be instructed to choose a place of residence elsewhere than at Peking, and to make his visits to the capital either periodical, or only as frequent as the exigencies of the public service may require."

But it might be said that the ratification had not been exchanged at Peking. He was not about to enter into any discussion in reference to the lamentable occurrences in the Peiho River—but he would say that the despatch he had quoted did honour to the Earl of Elgin, and clearly showed that it would be most prejudicial to the interests of this country, as well as of China, to insist upon the article in question. Then, it might be observed that no other country than England had preferred a demand for a resident minister at Peking. Neither France nor America had insisted upon the introduction of such an article into their treaties. He would not go into the question as to which Government—whether the present or the former—was to blame for the melancholy events which had happened in China. It was impossible that the Earl of Malmesbury could have foreseen the events which occurred off the Peiho. It was impossible for him to conceive that Mr. Bruce, sent on a mission of peace, would have declared war, without receiving instructions from home. The escort which was sent with him was to add dignity to his position, not to put it in his power to appeal to force to carry out a mission of peace. No particular Government was to blame more than another, the mischief had arisen from the predetermined system to treat the Chinese at one time as barbarians, at another as a highly civilized nation, and at all times with injustice. He regretted that the instructions which he would read to the House had been given to Mr. Bruce. In the despatch of the 29th of October, 1859, the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs said :—

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

“ You will take an early opportunity of apprising the ministers of the Emperor of China that in consequence of the attempt made to obstruct your passage to Pekin in June last, when you were proceeding thither to exchange the ratifications of the treaty of Tien-tsin, Her Majesty's Government consider that the understanding entered into between the Earl of Elgin and the Imperial Commissioners, Kweiliang and Huashana, with respect to the residence of the British minister in China, is at an end, and that it rests henceforward exclusively with Her Majesty, by the terms of Article 11 of the Treaty of Tien-tsin to decide whether or not she shall instruct Her minister to take up his abode permanently at Pekin.”

That showed that the stipulation was to be pressed on the Chinese, not because it was a wise or prudent one, but simply as a punishment to them for their misconduct. He had no desire to occupy the time of the House longer than was necessary, but he had by him quotation upon quotation from writers well acquainted with China, all showing that it would have been impossible to invent any demand which was more repugnant to the feelings of the people, and that if it were consented to, the Emperor of China would really not be safe. He hoped the Government would reconsider the instructions sent out to the Earl of Elgin ; for if this particular article were insisted on it was certain that we should never be at peace with China. Our dealings with China had been most unfortunate, but there was now an opportunity for taking a step in the right direction, and it ought to be taken at once. No minor considerations, no absurd scruples about dignity, ought to stand in the way. To quote an expression of the noble Lord opposite, the true dignity of a nation was to do that which was right and just. Before sitting down he wished to apologize to the noble Lord opposite for having contradicted him on a former occasion. The noble Lord stated that a Chinese despatch had taken four hours to translate, which he had hurriedly contradicted at the moment. Since that time he had seen several gentlemen conversant with such matters, Mr. Oliphant among others, and they had assured him that the noble Lord was perfectly correct. The fact told in Mr. Bruce's favour, and he was anxious not to do an injustice to any one. He would not longer trespass on the time of the House, except to again urge upon the Government the duty of restoring peace between the two countries, and to use every exertion to avoid a waste of blood and treasure.

Amendment proposed,

“ To leave out from the word ‘ That ’ to the end of the Question, in order to add the words ‘ in order to remove one great obstacle to Peace with China, the British Plenipotentiary be instructed not to insist on the fulfilment of the third Article of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, by which his Majesty the Emperor of China agrees that the Ambassador, Minister, or other Diplomatic Agent appointed by Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain may reside, with his family and establishment, permanently at the capital, or may visit it occasionally, at the option of the British Government.’ ”

—instead thereof.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL : Sir, the hon. Gentleman cannot but be aware that he is making a Motion not only most unusual in form, but which interferes with the authority of the Crown. He seems altogether unmindful of the fact that the Earl of Elgin is sent out by Her Majesty. He has received his instructions from Her Majesty, and he will conduct himself according to those instructions. It is impossible, if this Motion were agreed to, that Mr. Speaker should undertake to send out instructions to the Earl of Elgin. If he really meant to attain his object, the hon. Gentleman should have moved an Address to the Crown, praying Her Majesty to give these instructions to the Earl of Elgin. If the House of Commons were to undertake to give instructions to our Ministers at foreign Courts contradictory to those which have been given by Her Majesty, the greatest confusion would be introduced into our affairs. It is quite impossible, therefore, for the hon. Gentleman to insist on his Motion. With regard to the Motion itself, it is answered in a very few words. He tells us that the Chinese look upon it as a great degradation to have a foreign Minister resident in Pekin, that the people would rise, that the Emperor of China would be lowered in the eyes of his subjects, and that it would be impossible to insist on the condition without completely ruining the authority of the Emperor. But it so happens that after the Earl of Elgin had advanced that condition and had inserted it in the Treaty of Tien-tsin, Russia, having a title to every advantage we gained, claimed the privilege of sending a Minister to Pekin. The Chinese Government did not object to his going there, they only pointed out that they wished him to go by the Overland route. He did go by the Overland route, he was received with great distinction at the Chinese frontier, he went to Peking, and he has been resident there a great many months. Yet, the empire of China has not fallen, the Emperor of China is apparently not degraded. The people of Peking have had an opportunity, perhaps the first, of seeing that there are other potentates in the world besides their Emperor, other States, the sovereigns of which are not his vassals and subjects, but claim an equal rank with him. This fact has been revealed to them, and we should add nothing to the demonstration by sending a British Minister to reside at Peking. The Earl of Elgin, with whom I have had many conversations on this point, always said that the state of the question was entirely changed now, because, as there is a Russian Minister resident at Peking, it would be impossible for the Chinese Government to argue that they could not grant a right to Great Britain which they have granted to Russia, and which has been exercised by Russia without dispute. That being the case, the Earl of Elgin was of opinion—as were all the Members of the Cabinet—that we should insist on the condition that a British Minister should reside at Peking, not as a punishment to the Chinese, but as a condition which had been agreed to by the Emperor himself. The option of the British Minister residing at Peking or elsewhere was an indulgence agreed to by the Earl of Elgin after the Emperor of China had approved the treaty—it was an option to be exercised by the British Government, not by the Emperor of China. That which the hon. Gentleman says the Chinese would never agree to was actually in the Treaty of Tien-tsin, and was agreed to not only by the Ministers of the Emperor, but was confirmed by the special ratification of the Emperor himself. In the first place, it is quite impossible that this House can give instructions to our Minister contradictory to those which Her Majesty herself has given, and in the next place there is no reason why those instructions should be altered. I hope, therefore, that the House will not agree to the Motion.

Question, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question,” put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.—CHINA WAR.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

£443,896 Repayment of Advances on account of former Expeditions to China.

Lord John Russell

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I should like to ask whether any Member of the Government can tell us when the East India Company announced to the Imperial Government that the money was not only due, but that payment was expected during the present financial year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: In point of fact the true explanation of this case is to be found in the nature of the system which prevails between the two Governments, whereby payments are in fact allowances made on an open account. The British Government has at present, under the system under which it supplies so very large a British force to India, very large claims against the Indian Government, and the consequence of that is that the Indian Government can withhold satisfaction of the claims sent to them, and thus pay themselves. The British Government is not in a state to prevent the operation unless in case we happen to be debtors to the Indian Government, and then it is a question of account before the balance is liquidated. I think the question of my noble Friend is, when the Government became aware that the Indian Government had made these stoppages. I can ascertain that exactly by inquiry. I myself was not aware of it until a fortnight or three weeks ago. I believe that before the commencement of the last quarter the Treasury were made aware of it, but I only knew of it within the last two or three weeks, since the time when my statement was made to Parliament with respect to Chinese expenditure. Upon inquiry a more particular answer can be given to the question.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Secretary for War how soon he thinks the Returns will be laid on the Table for which I moved the day before yesterday, as I think it will throw light on the subject?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: I will take care that it shall be laid on the table as soon as possible, but I am afraid it will not throw any great deal of light upon the subject, because I stated that the figures were entirely conjectural, and of course the Government will not be bound by a Return of that character.

MR. BRIGHT: I wish to ask a question of some Member of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the amount of force out in China. If I am not mistaken, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India stated that the amount of force ordered was not more than 10,000 men. We hear now that there are 20,000 men there. I will not go into the question whether 20,000 were necessary, or 10,000 not enough. I believe that for any purpose contemplated by the Government, however unjust, 10,000 would be ample. But I should like to know who ordered that increase of force—whether it was the decision of the Cabinet, whether it was the decision of some authorities in India, or whether it was the decision of the Horse Guards at home. It makes a great difference in the expense, which embarrasses the House and is embarrassing and threatens to be very perilous to the Government. I do not know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the noble Lord at the head of the Government, the Secretary of State for War, or the Secretary of State for India can answer,—because it may be under either of those four heads; but can any one tell us anything about it? The House has a right to know. I, therefore, take the liberty of putting a distinct question, and I hope I shall have a distinct answer.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: I think that on a former occasion both myself and my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for India, stated the intentions of the Government as to what force should be employed. I should say that Estimates framed by the Earl Canning, on the representations of Lord Clyde, differed from the estimate at which we arrived. When first we became aware of the events which took place at the Peiho, we sent reinforcements to the garrisons of the ports in China, fearing some general rising against the European population, and thinking it better to have at those ports a sufficient force to guard British life and property. We stated at the same time that it was the intention of the Government to send, in the spring, a larger force for operations in the North. The Indian Government wrote to us that they were about to send a force, on the whole, larger than we contemplated. We endeavoured to arrest their departure by communication; but it is not so easy to conduct war at that immense distance; especially as the basis of operations was beyond the reach of constant communication with ourselves. Under those circumstances a larger force was sent. The force now in China amounts to between 17,000 and 18,000 men. The expeditionary force itself is about 10,000. The rest form the garrison, and there are about 1,700 men detained at Singapore as a reserve.

VOL. CLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. BRIGHT: I do not ask any question about the French force, and I do not know that we have anything to do with it; but, of course, the amount of the French force bears on the necessity of so large an English force. I should like to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will lay upon the table of the House any correspondence between the Government and the Government of India upon this subject? Bad as our condition is, it will be ten times worse if Lord Clyde, or any one else, can send off 10,000 men without orders from the Cabinet; and, without knowing what policy is to be pursued, can ship off some 5,000 or 10,000 men numberless miles further, and then send in the bill for payment to the English nation. Nothing is more likely to preserve our finances in a chronic state of embarrassment, and cause endless difficulty to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Of course there must be despatches; and I wish to know whether the Government will let the House know by whose authority, and in what manner, this extraordinary act has been committed, by which an unnecessarily large force is accumulated in China—increasing the temptation to the authorities there to enter into warlike proceedings; aggravating the expenditure, and therefore increasing the taxation of the people. If the Government tell us they will give the despatches, we shall know all about it; all which the statement of the right hon. Gentleman does not tell us, and which ought to be known.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: I will look through the despatches and see if they can be given; but, of course, many communications took place by telegraph. Let me add, that Lord Clyde had been in China; and it was not unnatural that Earl Canning should be influenced by his opinion. I know that the opinion of Lord Clyde was, that a large demonstration was more likely to terminate these differences rapidly, and prevent the effusion of blood; and therefore to say that the act was without the consent of the Cabinet, when it was only in anticipation, is to cast blame when it is not deserved.

MR. BRIGHT: I am not about to cast blame. What I want to know are the facts. But I protest against the assumption just made that Lord Clyde thought this or that. I might think that a great demonstration would prevent the effusion of blood; but, whatever I might think, neither I nor Lord Clyde had a right to send a single soldier beyond what was ordered by the Government. If the course to be taken is to be dictated by public servants thousands of miles off, the Cabinet may as well be dethroned, and the House of Commons may as well abdicate its functions.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE: There is another point of great importance. This House ought to be in possession of accurate details of the monthly expenditure with regard to this war. We have 17,000 men in China, but those 17,000 men are attended by a very large number of camp followers. There is also a large Transport Service, and the price of coal is 60s. or 70s. a ton. The cost, therefore, of carrying on warfare at that distance must be enormous. I believe that this war will last for a very long time, and under the present policy I do not see any end to it. But it will not do for the hon. Member for Manchester to object. It is really a Manchester war. It was originally got up for the purpose of creating traffic with China, and forcing our manufactures upon that people. I do not see how it is possible for my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester to stand up and find fault with a war which he and his Friends were the first to commence. But we ought to consider the position in which we are placed. We can exercise no control. The Governor General sends on troops when he pleases, and the accounts are always running. We shall find our finances in a very extraordinary state if we do not very speedily bring the matter within compass; and, as a first step, we ought to know what are the actual monthly outgoings.

MR. BRIGHT: I trust the House will allow me to interfere for a moment. The hon. Gentleman ought first to recollect that I am not the Member for Manchester; and, secondly, that there have been no greater opponents of mine in that city than those who are connected with the China trade. It was exactly upon that question that I ceased to be Member for Manchester. Further than that, the House must recollect that the origin of all the calamities in China, as stated by the hon. Member for Lanarkshire, has been connected with the trade in opium and not the trade in cotton. If there be any Friend of mine who believes that honest trade can be promoted by this policy, I can only say I will utterly repudiate him and his views.

MR. ROEBUCK: I was anxious to rise before the hon. Member for Birmingham

Mr. Bright

(Mr. Bright), in order by my independent evidence to exculpate him. But while exculpating him there are others who do deserve blame. I remember once a majority against the noble Lord at the head of the Government, joined by the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Secretary for War, and the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. They were all then virtuously indignant at this Chinese war. We were told that we had so advanced in knowledge that we ought to set an example in virtue and forbearance; but that we were about to impose by force, on a people who in religion were much beneath us, and in virtue could not dare to compete with us, a traffic which was odious to them; that we were about to send a force to thrust down the throats of that people a drug the consumption of which violated one of the first principles of their morality. And there was a party in this country—connected, I believe, with Manchester, but to which I do not say that the hon. Member for Birmingham did then, or does now, belong—who sided with the noble Lord at the head of the Government in a war with China. The House of Commons placed these men in a minority. The noble Lord then appealed, as the cant phrase is, to the country. The country gave him an acquittal, and supported him in the policy which he had adopted, and now we have to pay for it. We are not yet at the end of the Bill, though. At the commencement of the Session we were told that the Estimates would be laid on the table, and that we should soon know what the China war would cost us. The Estimates were laid on the table. Persons whose ill fate it always is to find fault, said we did not know what the whole amount would be; and in reply they were told that they were always groaning, always grumbling, always prophesying evil. Then came the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a Bill of £4,000,000 more. But £4,000,000 more is not the end of it. And what has all this outlay been for? The original object of this war was to maintain the opium trade for India. That was the end which the war was really intended by the country and by the Government to attain. The House of Commons repudiated the transaction; but the people of the country, fascinated by the prospect of getting our manufactures introduced into China, aided and abetted the Government in a most immoral war. I am glad that there is a Nemesis. The punishment has followed swiftly on the crime. We have now £4,000,000 of money to pay; and the happy expectation is, that to the Bill £4,000,000 more will soon be added. [An Hon. MEMBER: "It will be £6,000,000."] Aye, £6,000,000, I warrant you, and more than that. The people of this country must learn that they cannot break through the great principles of justice and morality and expect to retain the good opinion of the world. This House—no, not this House, but one which preceded it—did its best to prevent the calamity. The present House has aided and assisted, as much as it could, the noble Lord in the career in which he is now running. We are now reaping the first fruits of his policy; the last fruits we have yet to see. It will be a lucky thing if we see them twenty years hence.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE: I have to offer an apology to my hon. Friend opposite for having connected his name with the imputation which I cast on that section of politicians to whom I believe this war is due. I had not the honour of a seat in the House at the time when these occurrences took place, and I had forgotten some of the circumstances. But in my place in this House, I must express my conviction that the Chinese war was originated by the pressure of that party in this House, and that if that war be not arrested, its consequences will prove highly disastrous to this country.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS observed that nothing could be more natural than that Earl Canning should be guided by the opinions of Lord Clyde; but he should be glad to know whether Lord Clyde was aware of the amount of force sent by the French to China, and of the policy of the Government at home when he recommended the additional men to be sent.

LORD LOVAINE said, he trusted that the House, and especially those who represented the commercial party in it, would profit by the severe lesson which was now being administered. He hoped that the policy which had involved us in that war would be abandoned; that the desire to extend our commerce would not be indulged beyond its legitimate bounds; and that we should not again be driven to support our commercial policy by force of arms.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the preparations in India were made in the first instance without any instructions from home, upon the receipt of the intelligence from China of the affairs at the Peiho. The consequence was that a much larger force was ultimately sent to China than was thought necessary by the Cabinet. Even after the instructions had been sent out to India, Earl Canning still doubted the expediency of sending so small a force to China, and on the advice of Lord Clyde recommended the employment of a much larger force.

MR. SCLATER BOOTH said, that he had been for some weeks engaged in assisting a friend of his in bringing under the consideration of the Government a mine in Formosa, from which, it was alleged, coal could be raised at a cost of from 6s. to 12s. per ton. He was desirous of knowing whether the Government had taken any steps in the matter.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, they were now called upon to vote £443,896 for a purpose which had nothing to do with the present war, and he therefore hoped that that war would be left entirely out of consideration while that item was being discussed. The observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) showed that they were in imminent danger of bills being run up on account of India which this country would have to pay. Such was the position in which they now stood. This £443,896 had been so incurred, but no Gentleman could now object to its being paid. He did not, however, think that any Gentleman knew for what that debt had been incurred, and he submitted, therefore, that the Government ought to prepare a balance-sheet showing the purposes to which it had been applied. It was obvious, now that the old Government of India was done away with, we were in still greater danger than we were during its existence of having more debts of a similar kind incurred, which of course would have to be paid. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had stated that there had been no settlement come to with the Indian Government since 1848. That was eleven years ago, and other debts might have been incurred since. He should, therefore, like to know up to what period this £443,896 would balance the account. Did it clear the account up to 1858-59? He believed not. He had also understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that there was a sum of £281,000 yet in dispute. Was there still a large amount outstanding on account of a previous China war? These were points which the Committee should clearly understand, before they passed the Vote now applied for. They ought to be specially guarded upon this point, because they had heard from the right hon. Gentleman that an account was already running up with the Indian Government amounting to nearly £2,000,000 for the present war. The Vote under consideration was only a sample of others which would follow in the course of time. There was no hope, he supposed, of finding out how the debt was incurred; but it was the duty of the Committee to insist upon the production of a balance-sheet, showing how the Indian Government ran up these accounts against the British purse. Unless they did that the two finances would become perplexingly intermixed. He had the greatest fears for the finances of India; those of our own country did not present a very pleasant prospect. It was high time that steps should be taken to check these demands upon the national Exchequer. He therefore requested the Secretary of War to state distinctly the period up to which this sum of £443,896 balanced the account, and whether there was any other debt still outstanding.

COLONEL SYKES said, this was the third time this country had been compelled to wage war with China, and on each occasion it was for pretty nearly the same cause—namely, their utter disregard of treaties we had made with them, and our obstinate persistence in our own course. By the two former wars we were compelled to garrison Hong Kong and Canton. The present war arose from our insisting upon the strict observance of the third article of the Treaty of Tien-tsin. That treaty entitled us to have an ambassador at Peking. But how did we attempt to carry that into effect? We made a military demonstration, and we told the Chinese we could only approach the capital in our own way. But instead of insisting upon what we considered a fit and suitable mode of approaching their capital we might have done the same as the Americans, who were quite as tenacious as ourselves of their dignity, and have followed the advice of the Chinese Government by taking a different route. Had this been done our Ambassador would have been received with honour, our treaty confirmed, and this war rendered unnecessary. But we had obstinately pursued our course, and what was the result? Brave lives and British blood had been sacrificed, and no benefit had been obtained. Our pertinacity, obstinacy, and pride had been the cause of all this.

Sir Henry Willoughby

He did not doubt that we should be victorious in the present war, and that we should get another treaty, or a piece of paper containing certain conditions. But to ensure those conditions being adhered to, what must be done? Were our men to remain in China and garrison the Peiho? Nothing short of this would secure the performance of those conditions, and we should further have to garrison Hong Kong, Canton, and Shanghai. This would impose a permanent charge upon the country which he was sure would not be submitted to. Under these circumstances he hoped Her Majesty's Government would regard more attentively the probabilities of the future, and provide in some better manner than had hitherto been done for the ratification of the treaty which would follow a successful termination of this war.

MR. CAVE said, he wished to make a suggestion in reference to the expense of the war in connection with our occupation of Canton. He was told that the English authorities kept order in the town, paid the police and other expenses, and then handed over the balance to the Chinese Treasury. He also heard that the Governor of Canton was most anxious that we should still occupy the town, because we gave him a larger revenue than he ever had before. The people, on their part, were equally anxious, because they were protected in purse and in person, which had never been the case before. Now it appeared to him that that balance of the revenue, instead of being placed at the disposition of the Governor of Canton, ought to be paid into a reserve fund to provide for any indemnity which we might require in future from the Chinese on account of their well-known disregard of treaties, and our consequent loss and misfortune. He entirely concurred with the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) in the sentiments he had expressed, and no one admired more than he the humane policy of modern times, which mitigated the horrors of war as far as the unarmed and defenceless population of a country was concerned. But he was bound to say that he thought it was carrying that principle a little too far when warfare was made so agreeable to our enemies that the event they regarded with the most dissatisfaction was the return of peace.

MR. ROEBUCK: The hon. Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) has demanded a balance-sheet. In that demand I fully concur. But there is another thing for which I would also ask, and that is that Her Majesty's Government should tell us what we are to gain by this war. What object have they in view, and what benefit is to be conferred by so extraordinary an expenditure of blood and treasure as that now contemplated? It was my fate to sit on the benches opposite, just under the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he delivered a speech to this House, than which I never heard one more startling, which more enchained attention, or which more completely won admiration and esteem. He then, Sir, fulminated against the Administration of that day for undertaking a Chinese war. He pointed out how vain were the ends they sought; and how mischievous were the means they took to attain those ends. But now, places being changed, opinions change, and I find him supporting the very vote which on that occasion he described as a disgrace to the country. The very words of that speech are now ringing in my ears, and I recollect turning round to the right hon. Gentleman and expressing to him—very presumptuously perhaps, but very sincerely—my earnest admiration both of the sentiments he then expressed and the manner in which he uttered them. Little did I think it would be my fate within three years to sit opposite that right hon. Gentleman, and find him the most eloquent supporter of this most atrocious proceeding. At that time, Sir, he spoke with an eloquence which was impressive, startling, and affecting. There could be no mistake as to his meaning, and no doubt as to his feelings. He did not then cover up his meaning with a multitude of words. He did not on that occasion smother his feelings in a multitudinous assemblage of verbiage. Not a bit of it. He was plain, succinct, and, on that occasion, very effective. So much so, indeed, that the effect of his speech on my mind, and upon the mind of the country, has lasted to this hour; and if I want a strong argument against the Chinese war, I have only to go to the quiver of the right hon. Gentleman and draw out the most effective arrow that could be discharged against that project. But, Sir, I want to know why this change has taken place. How is it that that which in 1857 was considered so very immoral becomes in 1860 so very right and proper? And why, descending from one step to another, do we find the right hon. Gentleman now an advocate for that which he then most violently and most successfully attacked? I would again ask any right hon. Gentleman on the Ministerial benches to state to this House the object which they expect to gain, and what benefit they expect this country to derive from an expenditure of blood and treasure, the end of which we do not now see, and from the violation of every principle of morality which was in 1857 so effectively defended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I would ask him, and his colleagues who on that occasion went with him into the lobby, how it is that, on this occasion, black has become white and white has become black?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I feel no difficulty whatever—[Much laughter.] I was going to add, if I had not been interrupted by the humorous reception of my first words, that I felt no difficulty whatever, although I felt a good deal of pain, in answering the challenge of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He asks how it is possible for a man to be so inconsistent as to have objected to a war with China in 1857, and to be the supporter of a Vote to carry on a war with China in 1860? The explanation of the fact, I apprehend, is this:—The nature of these two wars is entirely distinct—their causes are entirely different. It may be that the war in 1857 was right and the present war is wrong; or it may be that the present war is right and the war of 1857 was wrong; or it may be that both are right, or it may be that both are wrong. Without inflicting a multitudinous assemblage of words upon the hon. and learned Gentleman, there is here an abundant choice of alternatives. With respect to the present war, I hope I have never spoken of it in any other terms except those of the deepest regret and lamentation. I conceive that the steps taken by the Government have been adopted in conformity with their public duty, and, painful as that duty has been, I do not think that that opinion has been at all confined to such Members of the House as have changed places since 1857, because the policy of the Government had not been challenged in this House. And, though I for one have seen with the greatest satisfaction that the House was disposed to deplore the occurrences which have rendered the war with China inevitable, yet I think hon. Gentlemen, generally speaking, admit the existence of its necessity. When we found what had taken place at the mouth of the Peiho, the hon. and learned Gentleman will, I am sure, admit that while we deemed it to be our duty, in the interests of our countrymen and humanity at large, to send a considerable force to China, we at the same time manifested a desire to make that force the bearer of a message containing terms as moderate as it was possible for us, under the circumstances, to propose. I do not believe any hon. Gentleman has stated it to be his belief that those terms inclined to the side of violence or severity. Sir, I, for one, have ventured, perhaps in excess of my duty, to point out in remarks lately made in this House what I consider to be the root of these wars. I have never attempted to dissemble in this matter, or to gloss over the evils in respect to it with which we were called upon to deal by an appeal to national pride. Upon the contrary, it has always appeared to me right that the House should be afforded a full view of the enormous cost of this war, and should be made alive to the possibility of the renewal from time to time of a great expenditure for the prosecution of hostilities with China, unless we adopt wise and prudent rules to guide us in all our transactions in the East. I cannot regret that hon. Members should have an opportunity of daily weighing all the social and political responsibility which this quarrel involves. I, therefore, feel I have no reason to shirk the questions which, in a temper of which I have no reason to complain, have been put to me by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite.

I now turn to the observations of the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) who has expressed a wish to know what the monthly disbursements are on account of this war with China. My answer to the hon. Gentleman must be that it is entirely beyond our power to furnish him with any trustworthy accounts of that nature. In regard to a war of that nature, having its basis of operations in India, it would be a mockery to attempt to render any precise information, such as that for which the hon. Member asks. I may, however, state that we have framed the best estimates in our power from such unofficial data as the Indian Government have supplied, and our knowledge of what has actually taken place in China. We are not, I may add, aware that there is any ground for the assertion which is made by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield and others, that all the money which we require at your hands has been already spent, and that many more millions will be required in order to defray the expenses of the year. At the same time I feel it my duty frankly to state, now that hostilities have broken out, that this whole matter is full of uncertainty. One piece of information, I may say in conclusion, which I can give the hon. Member for Portsmouth—if he should wish to have it—is the amount of the draughts drawn by the Treasury Chest in China upon the Treasury at home, with the view mainly of meeting the expenses of the war. But even that account, if furnished, would not be very explicit, inasmuch as the ordinary and extraordinary expenditure could not be distinguished on the face of it. It simply remains for me to add that the Government are in possession of no information on this subject which they are not desirous to lay before the House.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. BRIGHT reminded the right hon. Gentleman that he had not answered the question put to him by the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) with respect to the advances made by the East India to the Home Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the estimated amount of those advances during the years 1848-49 and 1858-59, was £281,396, while the charge at the end of last year, on account of the Indian military force sent to China, was £82,500, there being a further charge of of £80,000 for the augmentation of that force, which sums, added together, gave the total of £443,000 and odd, provided for in the Estimate which had been laid on the table. His right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Sidney Herbert) had read a document to the Committee in which it was stated, and he believed with truth, that the accounts for the last China war were not yet closed, various items remaining over to be adjusted. So far, therefore, as the details of the expenditure were concerned, no balance-sheet had been rendered. The audit of those accounts was, however, in progress, and although several points with respect to them still continued open, he did think the sum dependent on those points for adjustment were very large.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, the right hon. Gentleman had given no answer to the important question which had been put to him by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield with reference to the objects of the war.

MR. A. MILLS remarked that if the observations which the right hon. Gentleman had just made were to be regarded as furnishing an explanation of the policy of the Government in the case of China, he could only say that explanation left that which was before sufficiently inexplicable in total darkness.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to know whether the Government could not place upon the table the balance-sheet to which he had drawn their attention, so far as it went.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not think there would be any advantage in producing a statement of accounts which he believed had been actually balanced only up to the end of 1854.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, it would be useful to have a balance-sheet up to the year in which there was a balance.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The right hon. Gentleman has not deigned to give any reply to the questions which have been addressed to him as to the real objects of the war for which this Vote is to be taken. He, however, favoured us with a declaration, which I should have been glad to hear if it were of any practical value, to the effect that unless wise and humane rules were adhered to in the conduct of hostilities with China, nothing but evil could in his opinion result from the contest. But I may be permitted to remind the right hon. Gentleman that if such rules are observed something very different would have taken place from that by which preceding wars in China have been characterized. I may add, that although the right hon. Gentleman gives us no more satisfactory assurance than that which I just mentioned, he assumes a position which I venture to dispute, and which is that this House has sanctioned the war with China, and that it is being carried on with our full approval. Now, let me tell the right hon. Gentleman that this war was virtually commenced not only without the consent of Parliament, but that military proceedings had been entered upon and a large expenditure on account of it incurred even before Parliament assembled, and that this is really the first opportunity on which the opinion of the House of Commons has been tested on the subject. And now, let me ask, is that opinion now tested? Why, by laying before us a gigantic bill for a sum which has been virtually expended, and the payment of which we have, consequently, no power to resist. I am, however, happy to think that, so far as the debate to-night has gone, no inadequate test of the view which the House of Commons takes on this question has been afforded; and I would entreat the Government to reflect, to weigh well the fact, that scarcely a single Gentleman on either side of the House has in the course of this discussion risen to express any sympathy in the objects for which this war is undertaken. For my own part, I earnestly pray and hope that this melancholy and miserable contest may be brought to as speedy a termination as possible, and that the utmost consideration may in its prosecution be shown for the feelings of the Chinese people.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I have heard again from a Member of the late Government the expression of his ignorance of the objects of the war with China, but surely if any Gentlemen in this House ought to be informed as to the origin of that war, those are they who chose a Minister to go to China, who appointed an Admiral who was to command our vessels in the Chinese waters, who gave instructions to Mr. Bruce, and who directed from the Admiralty that he should be accompanied by a sufficient force, said one Minister; by an imposing force, said another Minister. We were, like the rest of the House, astonished, and at the same time grieved, by the arrival of the news from the Peiho. Those events were not of our preparation. We had not appointed the Minister, nor had we given him his instructions, but there came upon us this calamity, and now it appears that the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty hold us responsible for that calamity. Well, the noble Lord seems to think we were not afflicted by this intelligence. But we are not to be supposed to be less than other Members of this House, or than any person in this country, afflicted by this intelligence, or to grieve less for the loss of our countrymen. I apprehend that we regarded with more sorrow than any one else the renewal of the war. We did grieve deeply to receive this news, but it was not the less our duty to consider what, as the Ministers of our Queen and of the country, it behoved us to do under the circumstances. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Sykes) says, to my surprise, we might have taken the same course that the Americans took; but they took that course, not having sent out an imposing force to the Peiho, and not having endured this calamity. The time had passed. I am not now disputing whether that was a wise and a dignified course which was taken by the Americans, but the time had past when we could take that course. It seemed to us, not only from the first aspect of affairs, but from every account that came from China, that unless we asked for some reparation upon a basis honourable to this country, the lives and property of every British merchant and subject in China would be exposed to great danger. It was our business—it is our business—to protect the lives and the property of our countrymen. That duty we are bound to perform, and that duty we will perform. I am told that this war may cost much treasure. I regret much that our treasure should be lost. I am told that it may expose the lives of many gallant men. I lament that those lives should be exposed to danger. I lament the loss of life that may occur, but it is our business, as representing this great empire, to see that the subjects of this empire are not injured. It is our duty to see to that; but if the noble Lord or any one else thinks we are pursuing a wrong course, I can only say that at the commencement of the Session we described the general course we were pursuing, and, if I mistake not, we took a Vote of money on account of it. The noble Lord then, or any other Member, might have moved an Address to the Crown praying that no naval or military forces should be sent to China, that we should rest contented with the disaster at the Peiho, that we should not take any steps to resent it, but that we should continue, without the enforcement of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, upon our ordinary relations of peace without making any demand for reparation. That was in the noble Lord's power; and if his opinion is what it appears now to be, why did he not take that course, and boldly take the opinion of the House upon the subject? But no; the general opinion was that we could not sit down under the disaster. I am now told that for the sake of morality we should be satisfied. It is an odd way of teaching morality to say that a treaty having been made with a nation, when a Minister comes to ratify it, that nation shall not give him any notice that he will not be received if he comes by a certain route, but shall enter into apparently friendly relations with him, and receive his announcement that he intended to take a certain route, which was the common and usual route to the capital, and then that it should place in that route an army and cannon prepared with the exact range of his vessels, in order to destroy him.

Lord John Russell

That is the way in which the Chinese endeavoured to teach us morality. I know not that by submitting to that course we shall be doing anything to promote morality. But it is quite certain that the terms we proposed, seeing what a dreadful calamity war is, were not severe terms, but were moderate terms, such as, no doubt, required a disavowal and apology for those proceedings; but as to the terms of our future relations upon which this nation proposed to live in amity with China, they were no other than the terms to which the Emperor of China had already given his solemn assent, to which we asked for no addition. We sought no additional articles, but we asked for the execution of the Treaty. I am told, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is told, that those who were against the war on a former occasion must also be against it on the present occasion. The cause of the war may be utterly different, and it is the most absurd thing in the world to say that because a man was against a war with a certain cause, therefore he should be against a war with a different cause. Mr. Burke was taunted in the same manner when he approved the French war. He was told, "You opposed the war with America, and it is inconsistent for you to support the French war." This argument is, that because you think there is not sufficient cause for one war, therefore there is not sufficient cause for any war. Sir, I do not disguise from myself, and none of Her Majesty's advisers disguise from themselves, the fact that the entering upon a new war with China is a great calamity. We believe that the Chinese themselves are not hostile towards English traders who resort to their shores, and we find that the relations of commerce have continued uninterrupted from the day of the events at the Peiho down to the present time. Our orders have always been to confine the war as much as possible to those who are engaged in hostilities, and not to extend its misfortunes to innocent persons pursuing their usual occupations, and who are willing to enter into relations of amity with us. I believe those relations exist and will continue, and that the struggle will be between Her Majesty's forces and the forces of the Emperor of the French on the one hand, and the forces of the Emperor of China on the other; and, so believing, I cannot but think that the war will be of short duration. But, at all events, as I have said, it is our duty to protest the lives and property of British subjects. Those lives and that property have been endangered by an act of a Government which has made a solemn treaty with us; and when, in defiance of that solemn treaty, that Government sends a body of soldiers to attack our sailors and subjects, I say we are bound to demand some reparation for that injury, and to place our relations with that country in such a state that the Emperor of China and his Ministers shall respect this nation as one that is equal, at least, to the Chinese in all the qualities that become a great and independent nation.

MR. T. BARING: Sir, I find it is said that this war is to be carried on in favour of commerce. As one somewhat interested with commerce, I must say I do not believe that so far as commerce is concerned there can be a more unfortunate event than this war. I say that for the protection of trade and of those engaged in trade it is not necessary that we should insist upon our Minister going up to Peking. If the noble Lord had consulted those who are concerned in trade there, he would have learnt that it is not at Peking that trade needs protection, but in those ports where commerce is carried on, and where alone British interests should be protected. The noble Lord says, "Why do you accuse us when you, when the Earl of Malmesbury, recommended that our Minister should go up to Peking?" The representatives of trade will tell the noble Lord that these contests and struggles of party, so far from interesting them, are much against their interests; and if the only answer the noble Lord can give us is that his predecessors did something like what he has done, then I say that trade does not care for either but laments the acts of both. I am bound to say, although I speak in opposition to the opinions of a majority in this House, that I have lamented throughout the policy of this country towards China, and I regret that the policy of Sir John Bowring and the noble Viscount received the approval of the country. I believe that the policy then pursued was the most disadvantageous, I might almost say the most disgraceful, to the country. It has led to what has followed, and the noble Lord and those who sit with him on the Treasury bench may reconcile the fact as they please to their own consciences and feelings. It gave, I say, an impulse to the opposition to what they call in China foreign interference, and we are now reduced to this position—that if you go on with the war in China you may shake the dynasty that reigns there; for if you are successful the feeling in China is not with foreigners—with those whom they look on as barbarians; if you make the Emperor yield he yields against Chinese feeling, he may be shaken from his throne; you may introduce anarchy and confusion, and what you gain for trade you will get by upsetting all the established institutions in China. You are reduced to this most unfortunate alternative—you say you must avenge what has happened at Peking. The noble Lord says we are to do that for trade, for the protection of the merchants. But we do not for that purpose want to force the passage of the Peiho; still less do we want a Minister at Peking. The noble Lord said, the whole thing is now changed; Russia has a Minister at Peking, therefore we must have a Minister at Peking too. Now I do not want a Minister at Peking unless it will benefit British interests, although Russia may have a Minister there. I believe Russia in old times had a representative at Peking; but if we had a Minister at Peking, and France had a Minister there, and the United States too, all they would do would be to quarrel with one another, to introduce a system of jealousy and confusion, as has been done in other countries by diplomatic bodies. We do not want diplomacy, but trade, in China, and we want protection in those places where trade is carried on. This is not to be gained by forcing the entrance of the Peiho or establishing a Minister at Peking. The noble Lord said this war was a defence of morality—we must teach the Chinese morality.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I beg pardon of the hon. Gentleman. It was said on the other side that for the sake of morality we ought not to make war with China. I was answering that argument. I did not say we were teaching them morality.

MR. T. BARING: One great mistake we have made all along in China is that we seem to think that country is like France, or any of the other Powers of Europe, and we must force on China the same arrangements we have established with those Powers with which we have been for a long time connected. I believe that China, in view and feeling, is perfectly distinct from other civilized countries. I believe that if you seek to force on China a system of diplomacy and policy like that established among the European Powers you will have a great deal before you. You will never do much except to damage the trade of this country and force yourselves into repeated, constant, and, perhaps, unfortunate wars.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had asked what would be got by the war; the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) had asked what was the object of the war; but, for his part, he should like to know if the object of France and England were exactly the same, and why the Earl of Elgin did not remain in China and see his own treaty carried into execution?

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he would call the attention of the Government to only one point—how to prevent the recurrence of these wars. It was not fair for one party to cast blame on the other for these wars. Cabinets were mere puppets in such cases. They were invariably dragged into such contests by the unbridled combativeness of officials in those distant parts. Until they restrained the officials they employed they never would be able to prevent the recurrence of these wars. Mr. Bruce had led them into one war, Sir John Bowring had dragged them into another; Mr. Murray had dragged them into the Persian war, and the Marquess of Dalhousie into the Burmese war. If our officials led us into embarrassments with a European Power, as all officials thought themselves at liberty to do in Asia, they would be immediately recalled or disavowed; and until some condemnation was uttered, not only by that House, which had done its best, but by the Government, against these persons who had dragged us into these wars, it would be vain to suppose that any other measures they could adopt would be effectual to prevent their recurrence.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The noble Lord who has just sat down seems inclined to think that all the officials employed abroad by the Government in different administrations have violated their duty by dragging this country into unnecessary wars. I venture to say that if anybody will look into the circumstances to which he alludes he will find that these officials have done their duty and no more than their duty to this country. The hon. Gentleman who spoke before him greatly perverted and misrepresented the argument of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He wished the Committee to understand that my noble Friend had said that we want to go to Peking there to trade—"Why don't you go," said the hon. Gentleman, "to Ningpo, Shanghai, and Canton? If trade be your object, you ought not to insist on the terms you are requiring from the Chinese Government." But does the hon. Gentleman think that trade in a country like China can be secure unless your fellow subjects have certain rights and privileges assured to them? Does he think that a great number of British merchants would establish themselves on the coasts and in the towns of a remote country without any security whatever arising from the compacts made with the Government of that country that their persons and property would be safe? The hon. Gentleman knows commercial transactions too well, he is too well aware of the sentiments and opinions of merchants not to know that such a supposition is utterly inconsistent and untenable. It is perfectly well known that in order to enjoy good and advantageous trade with a country you must have treaty conditions and engagements by which your merchants who enter into transactions in that country may be secure, that they shall not suffer injustice either from individuals or from the Government. That is the object with which our treaties with China have been concluded. It is very well now to endeavour to treat lightly all such compacts obtained from the Chinese Government, but does the hon. Gentleman not remember with what acclamations of applause the treaty concluded by Sir Henry Pottinger was received in this country? Does he not recollect the anticipations which then prevailed in the mind of every one of the commercial advantages to be derived from that treaty? And although these anticipations may not have been realized to their full extent, yet allow me to say the increase of our commercial transactions with China since that treaty, and in consequence of that treaty, has been such as fully justified the policy of the Governments by whose instructions that treaty was concluded, and under whose auspices the ratifications were exchanged. Why, Sir, I had the honour of sending out the instructions under which Sir Henry Pottinger acted; the Earl of Derby's was the Government by whom that treaty was received, and who took credit for the transaction, and, so far from dealing with it as a light and insignificant treaty, were the first to proclaim that it would be attended with great advantage to the commercial interests of the country. After that came the transactions in the Canton river, to which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. B. Cochrane) traced the present war. Why, Sir, the present war has nothing whatever to do with those transactions. That is a most unjust and injurious charge to bring on the name of Sir John Bowring. Sir John Bowring had no more to do with the causes of the present state of affairs in China than the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. The late Government authorized the conclusion of the Treaty of Tien-tsin. The late Government sent out, as my noble Friend stated, a Minister, to be supported by a sufficient force, in order to exchange the ratifications of that treaty at Peking. The Earl of Elgin was not sent out to establish a set of merchants at Peking; but it was at Peking, the seat of the Government, that the ratifications of the treaty with the Government were to be exchanged, and without that treaty all our commercial transactions at Canton, Shanghai, and Ningpo and the other parts of the Empire would have been placed in jeopardy. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baring) says we are dealing with the Chinese on the mistaken notion that they are to be dealt with according to the forms of diplomacy usual in Europe, that the Chinese Government are simple-minded men and know nothing of these forms. But he must know that, of all men, the Chinese attach the most importance to forms. With the Chinese forms are as vital as matters of substance. And, so far from their being ignorant of forms, there is no nation which attaches more importance to the most minute gradation of form, none with whom it is more essential to maintain your own dignity and assert your own rights by binding them with those formalities, the value of which they estimate as well as, if not better than, any other race. Well, our object was to obtain that ratification of the treaty which should be binding on the Emperor of China. The Emperor, by an edict which he ordered to be communicated to our Minister, sanctioned in the fullest manner every article and every word of the treaty; but he knew as well as anybody in Europe does that a treaty, until it has been ratified by the Sovereign, is not obligatory on the Sovereign by whose agents it has been concluded. Therefore, although by an edict addressed to his own Minister the Emperor of China acknowledged and approved every part of that treaty, yet by refusing to exchange the ratifications he endeavoured to hold himself free, and at liberty to break every stipulation to which he had given his sanction. That was a state of things to which it was impossible for the British Government to submit. It was necessary, therefore, that the ratifications should be exchanged, and that by the terms of the treaty itself could be done only at Peking. It was, therefore, not, as the hon. Member implies, for the purposes of trade that our Minister was to go to Peking, but to obtain at that capital the ratification of a treaty which was to give security to the trade carried on at other places. It is a gross misrepresentation to pretend, then, that we are going to Peking for the benefit of trade at Peking, when the fact is, our object is the benefit of the trade elsewhere. Peking is the seat of the Imperial Government, where alone the ratification is to be obtained, and, unless it is obtained there, our commerce in every part of China must be insecure.

Mr. T. Baring

It is asked, "Why did you insist upon having direct communication with the capital—why did you insist on having a Minister there?" I say to that, ask those who sent out these instructions. If they do not choose to defend their own proceedings, I will give an answer for them. Ask any of our own merchants connected with China, or any of the merchants associated with them, and they will tell you that we have sustained very considerable inconvenience at different periods from being compelled to carry on our communications with the Chinese Government through their officers at the different outposts, who have played off against us all sorts of excuses and delays, pretending they have received no answer to our remonstrances, putting us off with one frivolous pretext and another, whenever we have complained of serious injuries or the violation of our rights. Everybody acquainted with China thinks we should have the power, whenever we choose, to hold direct communication with the seat of Government itself. What other country in the world with which we have commercial or political relations is there to the centre of whose Government we have not a right to go, and communicate either with the Sovereign or those who are responsible for the conduct of his affairs? I say that for us not to have the power of reaching Peking and having a representative, either resident there or, at least, able to visit the capital periodically when circumstances demand it, is to be placed in a position of inferiority in regard to the Chinese Government in which no country ought to stand in regard to another, and which certainly the relative importance of England and China does not require us to occupy. As my noble Friend has stated, the Government of Russia has a representative at Peking; so that at once falls to the ground every pretence put forward on the part of the Chinese that it is contrary to their feelings and habits, or inconsistent with the stability of their empire that there should be a foreign Minister resident in their capital. The hon. Gentleman says our proceedings will defeat our very purpose by involving that vast empire in convulsion and anarchy. I believe no such thing. That may seem very good reasoning to those who cannot attack what they wish to impugn by arguments of a different kind. But I say that if we succeed, as I trust we shall at no distant time, in obtaining from the Emperor of China the full and formal ratification of the treaty he has concluded with us, I am convinced that, so far from this endangering his empire, by restoring friendly relations between him and the great Powers of the West, we shall add strength and security to his authority. The hon. Gentleman says we ought to bear patiently the gross insults and cruel outrages offered to us, and submit quietly to the perfidious attack which took place at the mouth of the Peiho. Why, what were the feelings of the people of this country when the news of that disaster reached them? Was there a man living here who would not have indignantly scouted any Government which should have come down to Parliament and said we ought passively to submit to that insult—that we ought to allow our fellow-subjects to be murdered, our treaty to be torn up as waste paper, every indignity and outrage to be heaped upon us; and all this, which would not be borne for a moment if it came from any other nation in the world, was to be endured because it was received at the hands of a remote and comparatively less civilized State. I say that if any Government had proposed to the country such a course of action it would have been visited with universal condemnation. We had no choice, then, as to the conduct to be pursued. The only question in regard to which we stand responsible to Parliament and the nation is this,—whether we have adopted adequate measures and means for obtaining redress for the injuries that have been sustained, and whether those measures have been wisely planned and those means judiciously applied to secure the object to which our expedition and our resources are directed, and I trust the result will answer those questions in the affirmative.

Viscount Palmerston

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported on Monday next.

Committee to sit again on Monday next.

POOR LAW BOARD CONTINUANCE BILL COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD* said, he feared he must interpose before the Bill went into Committee. No one less than himself wished to bring religious matters into that House—it was not the proper place for discussions of a religious nature—but the evil of the present case was very great; he had been much urged to bring it forward, and he could not resist doing so under such circumstances.

Upon the present occasion he could not venture to adduce all that he had to bring forward—all that the nature of the case required—but what he did bring forward would bear the test of truth. He did not intend to divide the question categorically into these heads, but the question did resolve itself into evils of law and evils of administration of the law. He did not complain of any individual, or of any Board of Guardians, nor of the Poor Law Board. The latter had, on questions which had been brought before it, been willing to hear them, and to decide upon them for the best, according to its powers, or such powers as it was supposed practically to possess. In all that he had to propose he did so without interfering with any one, or with any established regulation. There was no need of intrusion upon any. What he suggested did not, he believed, give rise to any expense, or even anything that could be called trouble—it interfered with nothing. All he claimed was justice—and that justice had, no doubt, been intended by the framers of the law now in force—all he wished was in accordance with the evident intention of the law, which was chiefly regulated by the 19th section of the 4 & 5 Will. IV.—the Poor Law Act.

Now, he begged to say that looking at the case in the view in which it ought to be regarded, as one would think—the poor Protestant who entered a workhouse should in reality find greater advantages in a moral and spiritual point of view, than he who lived in some large populous town, or some remote country district. The atmosphere of the workhouse ought to be such as would conduce to this ; a chaplain whose duty it was to instruct the inmates and advise them—officers who were there to see to order—charitable visitors who came to look after them ; books lent to them ; all this ought to confer on a poor man greater advantages than he had found before. And now what was the case in Ireland—in Ireland the Protestants were in the minority—in this country the Catholics were so. See how the privileges of the Protestants were guarded in Ireland. He would read the regulations as provided by the Poor Law.

“ It shall be lawful for the said Commissioners, if they shall think fit, to provide a chapel, or to direct that a suitable apartment of the workhouse shall be specially appropriated for the religious worship of any denomination of Christians, being inmates of the workhouse.”—[Moore's Irish Poor Law, p. 142, 10 Vict. c. 31].

“ 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56, says, ‘ And be it enacted that the Commissioners shall take order for the due performance of religious service in such workhouses, and for appointing fit persons to be chaplains for that purpose.’ It goes on to say that not more than three are to be appointed—one of the Established Church, one Protestant Dissenter, and one Roman Catholic.”—[Moore's Irish Poor Law, p. 38.]

“ DUTIES OF CHAPLAIN—1. To celebrate Divine Service, and to preach to the paupers, &c.

“ 2. To visit any sick pauper from time to time, and at all times when he may be applied to for that purpose by the master or matron.

“ 4. To examine and catechise the children at least once in every month,” &c.—[Moore's Irish Poor Law, p. 675.]

Here, then, was provision showing how jealously the religion of the Protestant in that country was watched and guarded. Now take the case conversely—suppose a Catholic country where the Protestants were in a minority, and cases happened in regard to them similar to those as regarded Catholics in England. He would like to know how great would be the outcry on the part of certain Gentlemen in that House—we never should hear enough about the injustice and shame practised in such a case.

Now look at the poor Catholic who was in the workhouse. What ought to be done was that when once his creed was established he should be treated as of that religion, and facilities given him. But, perhaps he is not aware of his rights, and he encountered much difficulty. First, he must ask positively to see his own clergyman, and go through different forms in order to accomplish this ; the request had to be conveyed through the wardman,

&c., to the master before he could get at him—and delays might take place. While arguing against difficulties which were uncalled for, of course he did not mean that some form was not necessary. Now the Act of Parliament seemed to give the Poor Law Board all kinds of power for general regulations, and that Act most clearly meant that religious rights and principles should be protected—and whose rights were they ? They were those of the very poor and helpless, of those who had a right to be heard, and whose case was most deserving the attention of the House of Commons, who had none to befriend them, hardly, out of that House ; whose case therefore he must strongly urge upon the House. But what happened when the Catholic clergyman was admitted. Why, even then, there were considerable limitations to his access to those who asked his attendance. The Act says that he may have access to an inmate at his request at “ all times of the day.” It is evident that all proper means of the clergyman seeing this poor man was intended, and that when a person had sent for him, he would, as a matter of course, be able to see him more than once ; but this beneficent intention of the law is sometimes perverted into being obliged to send for the clergyman at each separate time of wishing to see him, thus giving infinite trouble to the officers of the house, and placing considerable difficulty in the way ; and this happens to the poor and friendless man whom sickness, old age, or adversity has brought into the house ; and who needs the comfort and consolation which he can derive from his clergyman alone. It is true, he admitted, that when hardships of this kind were brought before the Poor Law Board, as they had been in some instances, that Board had done what it felt it could to remedy the evil, but he wished he could say that the evil no longer existed. But when this was the kind of view taken in the working of the law, and when such was the interpretation placed upon it, it was clear that such evil cried for some remedy. But also in some cases one person might be kept waiting till others applied too ; and he was quite shocked to say that he had even heard of cases in which, when a poor sick man had seen a Catholic clergyman in a ward, and when the clergyman had given him all the necessary spiritual consolation, if another from a neighbouring bed had called out that he was a Catholic and wished the assistance of the clergyman, the power of giving such assistance was denied the clergyman, although the person had himself requested the aid.

Well, then, some persons were allowed to go out of the workhouse to attend their religious service at their chapel, such as obtained that permission were sometimes not allowed to see the clergyman when he came to the workhouse, unless they were sick. Then, again, others were only allowed to go out to divine worship once a fortnight. But it was singular indeed to say that sometimes persons were not allowed to do so until they were sixty years old—now, as their religion required that they should sometimes attend their service fasting, that is, not having eaten anything since 12 o'clock on the previous night, how hard it was to make these poor old people wait until 11 or 12 o'clock in the day without eating—then, again, the clergymen were very busy on Sundays, and could not give up the time to see them on such occasions. But he begged the House to observe with what real absurdity these cases were covered, when, for example, it occurred that where deserted wives and young women were not allowed to go outside the house to attend chapel—a woman might have been deserted by her husband say at thirty—and would have to wait for thirty more years before she could attend divine worship. Both of these classes, who would much need advice and instruction, could only be seen in the workhouse, therefore, in the limited time—perhaps an hour and a half or two hours a week—accorded to the Catholic clergyman; after he had seen the sick, or others—a mere remnant of time. Now, common sense seemed to show that the greater was the obstruction to persons going outside the workhouse for service, the greater should be the facility granted inside. It was very easy to furnish Catholic inmates with the means of attending their religion inside the walls, in the Board-room, for example, and what had been mentioned in one book treating on these matters as an objection was really none at all—there was no difficulty about an altar to conduct the service. He maintained that attendance on their religious service should be treated not as a privilege, but as a duty. It was plain that these poor people set a value on such attendance, because the permission was restricted if they misbehaved, and they were punished by being kept from it for a time. The discipline of the workhouse was much assisted by attention to these affairs. As an instance, he had known a case where, in a prison, a prisoner of most violent character could not in any way be restrained, he bit and severely wounded a turnkey, at last, contrary to the discipline which is adopted in prisons (where great jealousy is shown towards the religion of Catholics) it was suggested, "let us send for a priest," the man being a Catholic—this, though contrary to rule, being done, and the priest obtained,—the man immediately submitted and became tractable.

What he wanted was, that the practice of workhouse discipline should be uniform and just; that it should be liberally carried out, as it was in some unions; it should be brought down to one general level; and not one rule here and another there.

And he spoke to the House in favour of these very poor helpless beings, who were looked down upon, and had very few friends; and entreated that their case might be treated as it ought, in bare justice, to be treated. The persons whose cause he advocated were weak; they appealed with confidence to the British House of Commons, as a body who would hear them and apply a remedy to the crying evils by which they were afflicted. If they were denied relief, it was a mere mockery to talk of this being a country of civil and religious liberty: where that really existed these evils could not be. We were so proud of our excellent legislation, yet see how defective it was on points of such importance, and which might be so easily remedied, without trouble, or difficulty, or disturbing others.

He thanked the House for the attention with which they had heard him; but he had now to intrude upon them with even, if possible, a worse case, and that was with regard to the children in workhouses and district schools. Now, evidently the 19th section of the 4th and 5th William IV. meant that the children should be brought up in the same religion as the parent. But as the thing stands in practice, observe how it works. Suppose, after due examination, a father and child admitted into a workhouse, they are properly described on the Register as Catholics. Well, following the usual method of treating the case, that child is nevertheless brought up as a Protestant, unless the father takes a further step, and besides stating as at first the religion of which the child is—then actually objects to its being brought up a Protestant. Common sense would point out that it should be otherwise, but thus the burthen is thrown upon the parent of taking this course in defence of the child's and his—the parent's rights. There is great injustice in this. For one reason, because the parent, alone and friendless in the workhouse, may fear to object—he will be very likely to think that his position in the workhouse will be the worse for making objection and giving trouble, and making himself to a considerable extent an object of remark and of separation from the great body of persons under the same roof; or, suppose it is some single parent, indifferent to, and reckless of, the religion of the child; neglecting a pledge given to the father or the mother who may be dead, but who may have left to the survivor the charge of bringing up the child in the Catholic faith; well, the child is not so brought up, and thus loses its religious rights, in consequence of this anomalous legislation. Again, the parent may think, “I will not disturb the child now—it will get a good education—I can claim it hereafter—and bring it up in its old religion;” but this may easily not happen, and thus, in point of fact, the child is cheated out of its religion.

Lord E. Howard

He had not time at this late hour of the night (past one o'clock) to show from the papers themselves the apparent discrepancy between the provisions of the 19th section of the Act, taken together with the Consolidated Order, No. 122. It only showed how carelessly the regulations on this subject had been made out. Taking them together, it would appear that they both prescribed religious protection to children, and by both of them that was limited to the children of inmates. Now how did this act in practice? Why, by the return of January 1st, 1859; in 629 Unions, out of 45,000 children in the workhouses, no less than 25,000 of these were “orphans, or other children relieved without parents;” thus a very great number were affected by this want of proper definition and proper attention to regulations for protecting religious rights.

But, now, how stood the case with regard to the district schools, and the numerous children placed in them? Whereas in the workhouse the persons to look after the religion of children were the parent; or in the case of an orphan the godfather and godmother—so in the district school there was a new regulation, and the next of kin came into play—and you might have this absurdity, that an orphan would be in a workhouse, entered as a Catholic but educated as a Protestant, claimed by the godfather, and the claim allowed, he might be instructed as a Catholic, moved to a district school, he would be again educated as a Protestant until the “next of kin” found him out, claimed him, and had him re-educated as a Catholic. Why, the thing was really absurd on the face of it, and it must be remembered that by the 8th and 9th of Vict. children were liable to be brought into district schools from a distance of twenty miles. Now how can the poor understand all these distinctions? In the workhouse the “next of kin” is no good; in the district school the godfather and godmother are of no use.

But the section also says, “child of inmate:” how then again as to deserted children—what becomes of them? In fact carelessness in these provisions is apparent, and in truth there is no equality for religion, and religious liberty is set at nought. In truth, at this instant, there are hundreds of Catholic children in district and pauper schools in the neighbourhood of this Metropolis, and, by very far indeed, the greater number of these Catholic children are being brought up as Protestants.

But now in order to claim a child and have him educated, you had cases where the personal attendance of the godfather was required. What a difficulty and a grievance was here. Who was the godfather or godmother? Who was the next of kin? Where were they? Perhaps the child was in London, the godfather at Liverpool or in Ireland; and here also were involved, waiting to establish the claim, loss of time, of wages, and so on; and all this for another person's child. Here was an instance of personal attendance being required and its consequences.

“Board Room, May, 1859.

“Dear Sir—I am directed by the Board of Guardians to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th instant, making application on behalf of Mrs. — for her godchild W— C— to be instructed in the Roman Catholic religion, also making a similar application for C— and A—, and I am to inform you that as the Board require the personal attendance of the godfathers and godmothers who object to the instruction of children in the establishment in the Established Religion, they are anxious to save you the trouble of making such written applications in future.

“I am, dear Sir, your obedient servant,
“— Clerk.”

But the person rightfully concerned in claiming may be far off in Australia or America perhaps. Here was a case where children were brought up Protestants because, though claimed by the mother, the claim was not allowed until the father in Australia was heard from. How was he to be got at?

"A Catholic woman in a workhouse has four children. The father, for want of work at home, has gone to Australia. He had been in a situation of trust. The boy used to attend the Catholic school. The mother said she knew her children were being brought up as Protestants, and that she wished the Roman Catholic clergyman to instruct them. She signed an application to the Board of Guardians, 4th March, 1860. She was called before the Board, stated her wish, and was told that her request should not be complied with till she had procured an application from her husband in Australia. This mother is entered in the indoor relief list in the workhouse as a 'Romanist.'"

Here was the case of a Catholic widow whose child was brought up in another religion, and which shows the evils which befell these poor persons:—

"A written application was sent by the mother to the Board of Guardians—the mother was ordered before the Board, and stated her wish. The Chairman said, 'it could not be complied with,' and to defeat the object of the application threatened to send the girl from the school to the adult house. The Poor Law Inspector inquired into this case. The Chairman acknowledged he had used the above threat, and refused to listen to the application of the mother. This was in April, 1859. The girl has never yet been allowed to receive any instruction from her clergyman. The Poor Law Inspector knows of this case personally, yet no redress has been granted. In this Union it would appear that the women and children are in separate houses, and mothers are only allowed to see their children four times a year.

Thus, in consequence of these defects of legislation, this child loses its religion. Yes, and he had other cases too, but it was not proper at this late hour to bring them before the House.

These were only samples of the injustice which prevailed. He had another case, which he would not read, where children, the father being dead, were left by a mother, who went to America, in charge of a grandmother and aunts, who, contrary to the express directions of the mother, placed them in a workhouse. The mother wrote to beg they should be brought up as Catholics. A lady hearing of it went with the relations to the workhouse, they were insulted and unsuccessful.

In another, a Catholic sister applies for a girl, the girl being in the workhouse. She is moved from the workhouse to a Protestant establishment, the sister is unable to see her, or ultimately to hear of her, and access to her is refused.

He would not weary the House at this late hour more than he could possibly help, but he must remark upon one very large class, he was very sorry to say it was, which was also affected by this state of things—he meant the illegitimate children—in their cases the mother was powerless to prescribe the religion of her child, and yet the Poor Law throws upon her all the burden of the case. Surely she should have the power of saying how her child should be brought up. He deeply regretted to say that this was a very numerous class, there were of illegitimate children in 629 unions:—

"In workhouses, under sixteen years of age, of able bodied and not able bodied inmates there are—8,456 illegitimate to 10,382 legitimate; total, 18,838.

He must say that everything in these workhouses and district schools was of a different nature to the religion of the child. These children and people, comparatively few, perhaps looked down upon and laughed at, demanded, under these circumstances, more attention than could be given to them by their clergyman in the hour or two in a week accorded to him. Sometimes, perhaps, on a Saturday half-holiday, when the other children were at play, then the Catholic children were allowed to be staffed with catechism, and so, in fact, it is made a punishment to them.

But there was one thing he must particularly advert to. Partly to remedy one of these abuses, the Poor Law Board had issued an Order last year on the 23rd of August. There was nothing of any interfering character about it, it was a mild order enough, but it was stated not to be law, and not to have any force. Now he particularly wished to know how this case stood. It seemed to him quite unaccountable. The law itself, and the writers on the law, seemed on all points to give the Commissioners the utmost power; in point of fact there were only two things they could not do: one was to warp the religion of anybody in the workhouses, the other not to prescribe directions to Boards of Guardians, with regard to an individual in reference to his relief. But here was an order about which, most strangely, there appeared to be a doubt; and an opinion, it seemed, adverse to the power of the Commissioners had been given. There were often differences of opinion among different people, and sometimes there were amongst lawyers; and he much wished to know whether there was no authoritative opinion upon this order, and whether it really was the law of the land or not? Here in a very important matter the necessity of doing something, of affording a remedy to a great evil, was admitted and tried to be remedied, yet nothing was, in fact, done. He now placed the case before the House of Commons. It was the case of people, the most poor, the most friendless, the least able to help themselves—such was a case which appealed loudly to the House of Commons, and which he felt would not appeal in vain to such an assembly of British Gentlemen.

Lord E. Howard

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to introduce Clauses requiring that a Creed Register be kept, both in Workhouses and District Schools, and be open to the inspection of the Ratepayers; and providing that access, at all reasonable and proper times, shall be had to every inmate of such Workhouses and District Schools by the minister of the religious persuasion to which he or she belongs.”

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, although he believed that he was entitled by the forms of the House to ask them to reject the Motion of the noble Lord, on the ground that—either he proposed to the Committee to do what they had power to do without an Instruction, or to introduce matter which was foreign to the object of the Bill, and in either case an Instruction was informal. From the respect which he felt for his noble Friend and for the sincerity with which he advocated any matter affecting his religion, he would not avail himself of the power which he possessed. The subject, he could assure the noble Lord, was engaging the earnest attention of the Poor Law Board. The present Bill, however, did not profess to deal with anything beyond the immediate object with which it was framed,—it did not profess to remedy grievances, and additions such as those contemplated by his noble Friend could not be imported into it without serious inconvenience. The noble Lord's course ought to have been to wait for the Bill which, as he was aware, the Government intended specially to introduce, to effect amendments in the law, and he knew that it was the anxious wish of the Poor Law Board to provide for the evils of which Catholics reasonably complained, and which had reference to the attendance of ministers of different religions in the workhouses. The noble Lord well knew the difficulties with which the Poor Law Board had to contend, and the noble Lord could hardly doubt that he must be prejudicing his cause very much, by attempting to change the law in this respect in a manner that was so irregular. It was well known, that the present regulations with respect to the access of priests and other ministers to the inmates of workhouses rested on a provision in the Act, known as the New Poor Law Act, and could only be changed by an amendment of that Act. There was already some difficulty on the part of those who had to maintain the discipline of the workhouse, to know who to admit, for doubtless there were then many persons who sought to get admission as teachers of religion for the purpose of proselytism. He could not help thinking, therefore, that the noble Lord had not shown his usual discretion in attempting to accomplish his object, by means that were not quite regular, and which would interfere with the purpose of the Bill then before the House. There had been, he believed, some misapprehension with respect to the objects of the Bill, and it had been supposed that it was to extend the powers of the Board; it had, however, been carefully avoided to attempt anything of the kind—it was simply to continue the powers of the existing Board for the usual time, and did not in any way fetter the discretion of Parliament in causing any inquiry whatever to be made, either into the operation of the law or the Board. He hoped, therefore, that no further obstruction would be offered at this stage of the Bill, and that Members would not attempt in the absence of any evidence against the full success of the present system, without any complaints from the poor, and at a moment when a Report has been presented to the House, showing the most satisfactory results of the law, especially during the last year, to limit the duration of the Board for a less period than has been usual, and thus by casting discredit upon the central administration to paralyze its authority in future throughout the country. He firmly believed that it would be far better to abolish the Board at once than to weaken its power by such means. By the manner in which the Bill was drawn any change might be made hereafter in the powers of the Board, and he trusted, therefore, that the House would now allow the Bill to go into Committee.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he did not think it fair that the statement of the noble

Lord should be allowed to pass without objection. He (Mr. Newdegate) was as willing as any man to give paupers in workhouses every facility for coming out to attend to their religious observance. He would also give the individual Catholic pauper the right of sending for his priest; but the House had already decided that it would not be safe to give Roman Catholic priests an ex officio right to enter workhouses and prisons. As to deserted children, he could not consent to the surrender of the rights of the Established Church in respect of such children. They ought to be brought up in the religion of the State.

MR. EDWIN JAMES moved the adjournment of the Debate.

MR. HENNESSY expressed a hope that Mr. Speaker would give his opinion on the point raised on the Motion of the noble Lord.

MR. SPEAKER said, that if he had considered the Instruction was out of order it would have been his duty to inform the House, and save them from the discussion which had taken place. Whether on a Continuance Bill it was a convenient occasion to introduce such an Instruction was an entirely different question, but in point of form he did not think that the noble Lord was out of order.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he would recommend the noble Lord (Lord E. Howard) not to proceed with his Motion, and he hoped the House would proceed with the Bill, which was merely a continuance Bill.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 40; Noes 97: Majority 57.

Question again proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to introduce Clauses requiring that a Creed Register be kept, both in Workhouses and District Schools, and be open to the inspection of the Ratepayers; and providing that access, at all reasonable and proper times, shall be had to every inmate of such Workhouses and District Schools by the minister of the religious persuasion to which he or she belongs."

MR. EDWIN JAMES suggested that the noble Lord (Lord E. Howard) might remove difficulties by withdrawing his Motion and bringing up a clause in Committee.

MR. MONSELL said, he would beg to ask Mr. Speaker, would it be competent for the noble Lord to bring up a clause without such an Instruction as that which he now moved for?

Mr. Newdegate

MR. SPEAKER decided that it would not be competent for the Committee to introduce such a clause without a special Instruction.

MR. MONSELL said, he should in that case support the Amendment. They all knew the excitement recently caused by the alleged interference with the religion of a single Protestant child. There were hundreds of children of Catholic parents who were being brought up in the Protestant religion. Was that consistent with the principle of religious toleration?

LORD EDWARD HOWARD said, that as he began by saying, so he now repeated, that it was most distant from his wish to introduce a religious subject into the House, or to give the House trouble by taking up its time. His right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board was mistaken in supposing that he had blamed the Poor Law Board. Such was not the case, he not only did not do so, but he had stated that the Board was deserving of credit, so far as its action had gone. If his right hon. Friend would really undertake to take into his best consideration the evils he had stated, with a view of remedying them in the Bill he had mentioned as being prepared to bring before Parliament, he would not press his Motion. The subject was felt to be of so much importance that he was prepared to go very great lengths in its behalf. The settlement of this question would, he felt, save much trouble to this House, and also to Boards of Guardians, because such grievances could not exist without some remedy being attempted, and without the cases, if unredressed, being complained of and brought before this House.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, the matter was already under the consideration of the Poor Law Board. One portion of what the noble Lord required could be carried out by Board order. The other would require legislation. If what the noble Lord asked for could be done with safety, he (Mr. Villiers) should endeavour to effect it.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

House in Committee.

Bill considered in Committee. House resumed. Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday next.

House adjourned at half after Two o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, July 16, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Subdivision of Dioceses; Census (England); Census (Ireland); Queen's Prison; Court of Queen's Bench Act Amendment; Friendly Societies Act Amendment; Felony and Misdemeanour.

2nd Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment; Bleaching and Dyeing Works.

3rd Jews Act Amendment; Indemnity; Augmentation of Small Benefices (Ireland); Universities and College Estates.

SAVOY.—MOTION FOR A PAPER.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, in moving pursuant to notice for a Copy of a Letter to the late Duke of Wellington in relation to the military frontier of Savoy, said, that he had always disapproved of the proposition that Her Majesty's Government should take part in the Conference which it was intended should be held for the purpose of considering the Treaty of Turin, because he believed that such consideration involved a recognition of that treaty as thenceforward part of the public law of Europe. What had since taken place, although it might have diminished, had by no means removed those objections; and he expressed this view with the more regret as it differed from that of the two noble Lords who were more peculiarly responsible for the foreign policy of the country—the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. No man could be a more sincere friend to the French alliance than he was. He regarded it as of the highest importance for both countries, and for the advancement of civilization and for the peace and welfare of Europe, that between the French and English people and between the respective Governments a sincere and cordial amity and a close alliance should exist. But although holding that opinion strongly, he could not shut his eyes to events, nor forget those principles which were essential to the maintenance of peace between nations and to the feeling of general security. The condition of Italy engaged the attention of the Plenipotentiaries at the Congress of Paris in 1856, and it was represented that the foreign armies which then occupied her soil could not be withdrawn without leading to disastrous consequences. Now what were the facts of the case to which he was about to invite the attention of their Lordships? The noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), speaking as First Minister of the Crown in February, 1859, happily summed up the condition of Italy when he described it as a standing danger to the peace of Europe. It appeared that in the Autumn of 1858, Sardinia and France entered into confidential communication with a view of taking concerted action in reference to what was known as the Italian question; and on the 1st of January, 1859, public attention was aroused by some words addressed by the Emperor of the French to the Austrian Ambassador. Diplomatic negotiations were entered into, but without effect, and the short but sanguinary war ensued which was terminated by the Peace of Villafranca. In that peace no mention was made of any alteration of the limits of the French Empire. During the whole of these transactions, in fact, not a word was uttered of what was subsequently demanded by French ambition. On the contrary, any views of territorial aggrandizement or peculiar advantage were repeatedly disclaimed. Nevertheless, it was surmised, even in the spring of 1859, that, among the possible consequences of the action which France and Sardinia were about to take, the contingency was contemplated of the increase of Sardinian power rendering it necessary for France to demand an addition of territory. Our Ambassador at Paris was directed to make inquiries on the subject. To these inquiries he received no answer; and in July or August the rumour being revived, Lord Cowley was told that, as the war had terminated in a different manner from that which had been expected, when such a contingency was contemplated, there was no longer any question of an increase of French territory. Lord Cowley himself had told their Lordships that this question of the cession of Savoy had been mentioned in conversation by Count Walewski, but it was only referred to as a subject to be laid before a Congress of the great Powers of Europe. That Congress, it had been supposed, would have been held during the winter; and when the British Parliament met in January, they were told that Her Majesty's Government had been invited to a Congress, but that that Congress had been indefinitely postponed. About the same time the rumours were revived of the cession of territory to France; but so late as the beginning of February the Governor of Chambery was instructed to state, in answer to inquiries which were made from him on the subject, that there was no intention to cede Savoy or Nico. Now, in the Treaty of July it was agreed between Austria and France that the states of Central Italy should be restored to their Sovereigns. Events prevented this from being carried out, and the Duchies became integral parts of Sardinia. On the 24th of January, after the Duchies had become part of the Piedmontese kingdom, a formal demand was made by France on the Sardinian Government for the cession of Nice and Savoy. This came to us first as a rumour; and a telegraphic denial was received here of the truth of the rumour; it was said that no intention existed of giving up Savoy. However, on the 24th of March a treaty was signed without any Congress, and without the consent of any of the great Powers of Europe, by which the transfer of those territories was agreed on. This was the treaty to which England was called on to accede by entering into a Congress, the foundation of which must be a recognition of a violation of a previous treaty forming a portion of the great international law of Europe. No justification for it had appeared beyond the grounds put forward by the French Government. The King of Sardinia had been much blamed for his share in this affair; but no one who had taken an impartial survey of the events could refuse to acknowledge that such an amount of pressure had been put upon the Sardinian Government as made it a necessity and a duty for them to yield. The Italians did not share in the opinions expressed respecting him by the King's critics in this country, and he could well afford to remain satisfied with their approbation. The question, however, was on what ground could this treaty be accepted as a basis for the deliberations of a Congress. To him it appeared a flagrant violation of the international law of Europe. The ground on which the annexation of Savoy was defended was that it was a geographical necessity produced by the formidable aggrandizement of the Sardinian kingdom. But to what length was this doctrine of geographical necessity to be carried? Why should it not be extended to Genoa, to Geneva, or to a different side of the French Empire? Before going into a Conference some definite principle ought to be laid down as to the extent to which this new doctrine ought to prevail. The aggrandizement of Sardinia was put forward as the reason for this annexation of Savoy and Nice; but it did not appear that France had yet recognized Sardinia's possession of the Duchies, nor had Victor Emmanuel yet been recognized by France as King of that district of Italy. It was well known that he had never been recognized as King de jure. Yet we were now called upon to recognize the claims of France to Savoy and Nice, both de facto and de jure. And not only this, but he was informed that the agent of the dethroned Dukes had not long ago been officially received at the Tuileries. The guaranteed neutrality by the great Powers of the treaty of 1815 of the neutrality of Savoy and part of Switzerland had been set aside and disregarded in the most unjustifiable manner. It was almost amusing to observe the shifts to which M. Thouvenel had been driven to make excuses for the violation. It was first said that all the Powers of Europe were to be consulted. They had not been consulted. M. Thouvenel then proposed that those parts the neutrality of which was guaranteed should be ceded to Switzerland. But that proposal was withdrawn, on the ground that the population had been consulted and did not desire it. He did not see the use of going into a Congress with any view to establish limitations, when it might at once be said such points could not be touched because the population had been consulted and declared in favour of annexation to France. M. Thouvenel once more changed his ground, and said to the Swiss Federal Government, the stipulations at Vienna in regard to the neutrality of these districts were not for them, but for Piedmont; that the rest of the Powers of Europe had nothing to do with it; Piedmont was satisfied and therefore Switzerland must be satisfied. This was not the way in which the great Powers of Europe ought to be treated, and he objected to going into a Conference without knowing how far the sphere of their deliberations would extend. The strongest reason for going into a Congress was sympathy for Switzerland. As a matter of European policy, as well as out of regard for the patriotism, the valour, and the virtues of the Swiss, it was necessary that the independence and security of that country should be maintained. He acknowledged that in a Congress for the purpose specified—namely, to reconcile the 2nd article of the Treaty of Turin with the 92nd article of the Treaty of Vienna, some conditions and some stipulations might be framed which would not be without advantage. A frontier for Switzerland might be found possessing strong military positions. Their force was by no means contemptible, and if they had such a frontier and the passes of the Alps were conceded to them, their security, though deteriorated by the annexation, might be maintained. Arrangements might also be made for extending the neutrality of districts round Geneva and for garrisoning certain parts. But after all, the real advantage to which Switzerland must look was the union and concert of the great Powers of Europe in insisting on a guarantee of the independence and neutrality of that country. No one could deny that there had been a gross violation of the joint guarantee of the Powers which signed the Treaty of Vienna. But it was said that the guarantee was not changed, and that France took Savoy and Nice subject to all the stipulations under which Piedmont held them. It could hardly be said, however, that Switzerland was in as good a position as before, and M. Thouvenel himself had shown how untenable was that argument by proposing that the neutralized portions should be ceded to Switzerland. Looking to the position of Europe and the state of public opinion in Europe he thought that before they went into Congress to sanction what had been done they ought to have previous concert with the other Powers, of which he could find no trace in the papers which had been produced. The serious question was, whether in a Congress means might be taken to restore confidence and tranquillity. Look to the State of Europe. To whom were we to look to restore tranquillity and confidence to Europe and above all to France? What was the present condition of this country? Why, we were become a military nation; we were thinking of nothing but armaments, defences, volunteers, and militia. Why was all this? What was it about? Were the Estimates peace Estimates, and could England be said to be in a condition of peace? He said that neither were the Estimates peace Estimates nor were they in a condition of peace. They were in a position of suspended hostilities, and he wanted to get out of that position as soon as possible. He therefore thought it best to speak openly and frankly to the French Government, and to invite France to give us as well as Germany such assurances—practical assurances—as would tranquillize the public mind. The warlike excitement was not unfounded and the preparations were not unnecessary. They were unnecessary with regard to an invasion, because he was perfectly convinced that no Prince in his senses would think of that, and that an invasion of this country would never take place. People talked of the Volunteers showing our strength—it might be said ex pede Herculem. But he thought we had yet done nothing to show our real strength, for what were 130,000 or 135,000 men under arms, when, if an invasion were threatened, a million of men would be found on our coasts at forty-eight hours' notice, if the railways could carry them, able to work with their spades or shoot with their guns in the national defence? No man of ordinary sense or capacity would now think of invading England. But he could not deny that, looking to the general state of Europe, they were under the necessity of making preparations and bringing the expenditure to an amount not characteristic of a state of peace but of a state of suspended hostilities. What was the meaning of the Imperial visit to Baden? This meeting of crowned heads ought not to have been necessary. The motive assigned for the meeting of the Emperor of the French and the Princes of Germany at Baden was that the Emperor desired to render personally such assurances as would tranquillize the public mind of Europe, and remove the commercial stagnation which prevailed. That might be well; but what was the cause of the general uneasiness and apprehension? Notoriously it was this very treaty for the annexation of Nice and Savoy to France that had surprised and alarmed Europe, and caused every one to ask what was to happen next. Where a Government undertook the censorship of the press it could not avoid being responsible for the tone which that press assumed; and in the language of the French newspapers and pamphlets of the day would be found one of the chief causes of the excitement and anxiety which prevailed as to the future policy of France. The writer of La Prusse en 1860 assigned to Prussia the great task of establishing national unity in Germany. In La Question Irlandaise it was admitted that this might not be just the moment for European intervention to restore to Ireland her national position; but, at the same time, Ireland was assured that her cause deserved sympathy, and significantly reminded that the interest of France was wherever there was a just and civilizing cause to be assisted. In another pamphlet the writer warned England that it was only by an intimate alliance with France that she could hope to preserve her maritime grandeur; and hinted that, if she objected to justice being done to France upon the

The Marquess of Clanricarde

Rhine, the result would be an alliance between the Emperor and the Czar, which would be fatal to our naval power. The remarkable feature in all these productions was that the men who wrote them never seemed for a moment to imagine that things could be allowed to continue as they were, and that France and England could remain quiet. No one could forget how useful had been the good understanding with France that had existed for the last thirty years; and if France would only be content to leave what was moderately well alone, and abandon the idea that her interest was to meddle wherever a civilizing cause required assistance, tranquillity would be restored to Europe, and the alliance between France and England would become as cordial and intimate as could be desired. But it was impossible for England to go hand in hand with France when we were asked to enter on a course of policy which set at nought the security of treaties and the good faith of nations, and which might lead us to the subversion of all existing arrangements. He maintained that before we entered any Congress we ought to have a distinct understanding as to the tone which was to be assumed and the principles which were to be recognized. There was a recent example which warranted us in demanding some assurance on this subject. He did not ask the Ministers on the Treasury bench to confirm the truth of what he was about to relate, but he should be surprised to hear any of them contradict it. He had it, not from an official source, but upon authority so good that he could not doubt it. He was informed that when the Emperor of the French proposed to meet the Prince Regent of Prussia in Germany, the Prince with that candour and sincerity which was a part of his personal character, as it was also, he believed, of his public policy, at once made it a condition of the proposed meeting, that if any political propositions or considerations were to be deliberated upon, no change of territory whatever should be proposed to him during his stay at Baden. In the same way England had a right to insist upon knowing the principles which were to regulate the proceedings of any Congress to which she was invited. It was for the interest of Europe, and far more for the interest of France, that the present alarm and distrust should cease. There could be no doubt that in effecting the annexation of Savoy and Nice France had committed a serious blunder, and, instead of augmenting, had lessened her influence. No one who compared the influence which the Emperor of the French possessed last December, or even twelve months before, and that which he possessed at this moment, could doubt that it had been weakened by this transaction. If the Emperor wished to recover and increase his influence, he could not do so more effectually than by reassuring Europe as to his future policy, and putting an end to the painful disquietude which prevailed. The noble Lord concluded by moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copy of the Letter addressed by the Foreign Office to the Duke of Wellington in 1815, concerning the Military Frontier of Savoy, referred to in Lord John Russell's Despatch to Earl Cowley of April the 24th.”

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that there was no objection to produce the paper to which his noble Friend's Motion referred, but it would be necessary to alter the terms of his Motion, as no despatch from the Foreign Office existed on the subject. The paper to which his noble Friend referred was a letter from the representative of the Swiss Government to the British Plenipotentiary at the Congress of Vienna. It was unnecessary to follow his noble Friend in detail through all the topics of his speech, since a great portion of it consisted of an account of events well known to their Lordships, and the despatches of his noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office contained a clearer and more authoritative exposition of the policy of the Government than he could possibly give. The main object of the speech of the noble Marquess was to express the objection he felt to a Conference. That being the main point he should confine his observations to it. It was necessary to bear in mind the circumstances under which Her Majesty's Government had consented to enter into a Conference, and it was singular that his noble Friend, with his knowledge of the subject, had omitted the most important consideration of all, namely, the wishes of Switzerland herself. No doubt this country was bound to consult the interests and maintain the independence of Switzerland, both as a country in which from the character of her people we took a great interest, and also because her neutral and independent position was necessary as a part of the general arrangements of Europe, and because Great Britain had engaged with other Powers to guarantee her independence. Under these circumstances the first question in regard to the Conference was, what were the views of the Swiss Government itself? The Government of Switzerland had given no dubious answer to this question. They sent despatches to all the great Powers of Europe, demanding, in the most emphatic language, that a Conference should assemble. In asking for that Conference they could appeal not merely to the advantage of Conferences in dealing with questions affecting treaties by which the state of Europe was regulated, but they could appeal also to special stipulations as to the manner in which these treaties were to be observed, and these Conferences carried on. The latter point was so important to be borne in mind, that he would trouble their Lordships with an extract from the Protocol of Aix-la-Chapelle, dated November 15, 1818, under which these regulations were made. It stipulated that whenever any of the questions mentioned before, namely, questions affecting the treaty concluded at Vienna, or any discussion between the different Powers occurred, there should be a Conference of the kind now proposed. Article 4 ran thus:—

The Marquess of Clanricarde

“Que si pour mieux atteindre le but ci-dessus énoncé, les Puissances qui ont concourus au présent Acte jugeaient nécessaire d'établir des réunions particulières, soit entre les augustes Souverains eux mêmes, soit entre leurs Ministres et Plénipotentiaires, respectifs, pour y traiter en commun de leurs propres intérêts, en tant qu'ils se rapportent à l'objet de leurs délibérations actuelles, l'époque et l'endroit de ces réunions seront chaque fois préalablement arrêtés au moyen de communications diplomatiques.”

The article referred to the Treaty of Vienna already spoken of; and the Protocol concluded as follows:—

“Et que dans le cas où ces réunions auraient pour objet des affaires spécialement liées aux intérêts des autres Etats de l'Europe, elles n'auront lieu qu'à la suite d'une invitation formelle de la part de ceux de ces Etats que les dites affaires concerneraient, et sous la réserve expresse de leur droit d'y participer directement ou par leurs Plénipotentiaires.”

Their Lordships would therefore see that the Protocol distinctly contemplated that when any of the States of Europe more particularly concerned demanded a Conference it should assemble. Switzerland, thus, demanded not only on grounds of general expediency that a Conference should assemble, but also on positive stipulations founded upon the Treaty of Vienna that expressly provided that mode of settling the dispute. That being the case, it would not be treating Switzerland with proper regard, and it would be lowering her still further than she had unfortunately been lowered in the eyes of Europe, if, when she appealed to the great Powers to consider her affairs they should reply that although she might think her interests required a Conference, it was not convenient for them to assemble. That, in point of fact, was the view taken by Her Majesty's Government, and these were the reasons why Her Majesty's Government at once stated that they were ready to meet the other Powers of Europe in a Conference. He might, perhaps, confine himself to what he had now stated; but his noble Friend had pointed out some of the inconveniences that might attend a Conference, and although he could not deny that some inconvenience might arise, he thought he might remove from the minds of their Lordships some misapprehensions that prevailed on this subject. His noble Friend had insisted on the necessity of making previous conditions before entering upon a Congress; and what were the previous conditions he required? Neither more nor less than that Her Majesty's Government should concert with the different Powers of Europe, excepting only France, to impose on France a particular policy. It was, however, obviously impossible for a Conference to lead to any good result if it were preceded by a condition such as that. If, on the other hand, Her Majesty's Government agreed with France as to the conditions on which the Conference should be held, that would be begging the whole question, and such a Conference would be merely a court for registering the decrees that had been already settled. His noble Friend said, that the whole fabric of European treaties had been shaken and disturbed by the change now made in the territorial arrangements fixed by the Treaty of Vienna; and he said he wanted to know why conditions were not obtained from the French Government previous to entering upon the Conference, by which that Government should bind itself to make no more such territorial changes, and especially that no changes should take place on the particular grounds and reasons alleged for this change of territory. He begged to tell his noble Friend, however, that if Her Majesty's Government were in a position to exact such a condition it would be the greatest mistake to do so, because what possible guarantee could they have more complete and efficient than the treaties that already existed? The present territorial arrangements of Europe rested not upon Conferences, but upon the express conditions of treaties, and what Her Majesty's Government and all the Powers of Europe had a right to ask was that these treaties should be maintained and observed, and it would be a matter of great regret if any other interpretation were given to these treaties. His noble Friend did not deny that guarantees might be given to Switzerland, that changes might be made in the distribution of her territory, that stipulations as to the occupation of a portion of the Swiss territory of Savoy might be taken into consideration, by which the position of Switzerland, if not entirely secured, might yet be materially improved. But his noble Friend went on to say that the true security of Switzerland was in the union of all the Powers to maintain the guarantee of her independence. He agreed with his noble Friend that that was her true security, and if that union had been maintained their Lordships would not now be discussing the question. But the difficulty was to maintain that union. Some of the other Powers of Europe, moved by other considerations, might not take the same view of the affairs of Switzerland that they had hitherto done. That was the case with the Russian Government, which, speaking through Prince Gortschakoff, thought the matter of less importance than Her Majesty's Government held it to be, and declared it was a matter of comparatively little consequence whether Switzerland had a little more or less territory. His noble Friend said, and he entirely agreed with him, that the position of Switzerland, as regarded other Powers, was based on the treaty by which her neutrality and independence were guaranteed. Still, there were supports and props that might assist in that basis being maintained, and these were that Switzerland should be in such a position that no Power should lightly attack and destroy her before any of the other Powers could interfere for her defence. In fact, the independence and neutrality of Switzerland were strengthened by the Treaty of Vienna, by the territorial position that was secured to her on her frontiers. The question had been so much discussed both in and out of Parliament that it would be familiar to their Lordships; but he would venture to point out what the position of Switzerland really was. One argument used to show that the position of Switzerland was not materially weakened was singular. It was said that she was weak on one of her frontiers, and that it would not weaken her by altering her position on the south. It was perfectly true that the frontier of Switzerland was not satisfactory on the side of Gex, and anybody who looked at a map would see that whereas the Lake of Geneva was formerly exposed on one side only, now it was exposed on both sides. No one could affirm that by entering the Conference such concessions would be obtained as would secure for Switzerland all that she required, or that the friends of that country might desire for her; but, at all events, an opportunity would be given for complete and free discussion, and if it should unfortunately happen that no agreement was come to, Switzerland would be in no worse position than she was now in. His noble Friend said by going into the Conference they would do nothing more than ratify the treaty. He (Lord Wodehouse) did not see why it should be assumed that they would ratify the treaty by meeting in Conference.

Lord Wodehouse

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE explained that he did not say that they "would," but that they "might" ratify the treaty.

LORD WODEHOUSE certainly understood his noble Friend to say that they would ratify the treaty; but he was prepared to say they would do no such thing by such a meeting. The French Government put the matter in this point of view. They said the Conference must meet to reconcile the 92nd Article of the Treaty of Vienna with the 2nd Article of the Treaty of Turin. Some people said that this was too narrow a basis of discussion; but if these two articles were to be considered they would open the whole question, and there was nothing whatever to prevent the Powers represented at the Conference making any proposal they might think fit. He thought he had explained that there were some good reasons for going into the Conference; and he could not see those dangers ahead which his noble Friend had pointed out. He would refer to what might be the alternative. His noble Friend had spoken at some length of the disquiet that unfortunately existed, not in this country only, but in other countries; and he seemed to think that that disquiet would be increased by this Conference. But he (Lord Wodehouse) thought that if such changes were to take place as had been made by this treaty between France and Sardinia without there being any discussion of them by the other Powers of Europe who were parties to the Treaty of Vienna, it was very possible that the disquiet would increase. Persons might naturally say there had been one change, and the Powers of Europe had not taken any steps with regard to it, and therefore other changes might take place with the same result. He did not mean to say that, supposing the Conference were to meet and separate without any such result as was desired, that would be a convenient or satisfactory position to be in; but he maintained that not to go into a Conference would be as dangerous as it would be impolitic, and would be to disregard the expressed wishes of Switzerland. His noble Friend spoke of the understanding which had been entered into before the late war, and he traced the course of events which had followed. It was not for him to praise the despatches of his noble Friend under whom he was happy to serve, but he was glad to find that the views taken by his noble Friend were approved by the noble Marquess. All he could say was that his noble Friend had shown us by his despatches that he was sensibly alive to the gravity of this question—that he felt the importance of maintaining the territorial position of Switzerland, and also felt that a serious inroad had been made on the territorial arrangements of Europe. It was useless to discuss what were the motives of the different actors in this matter; but one thing was perfectly certain—that the treaty which had been concluded, and by which Savoy had been transferred to France, had altered—materially altered—the position of Switzerland and greatly diminished the safety of that country, while it had given a precedent of a dangerous and unsatisfactory character to Europe.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he thoroughly concurred in one observation made by the noble Lord who had just spoken, that some attention ought to be paid to the wishes of Switzerland on this question; but he could not concur in the observation that the position of Switzerland was worse than before. On the contrary, he believed that the gallant stand made by her had raised her in the estimation of Europe. While however he said that he was inclined to go into a Conference, he by no means meant to say that any good would come from a Conference. He would not dispute the eulogium that had been passed on the skill and talent of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, as displayed in his correspondence on this question; but he must say it was the misfortune of the noble Lord that in none of his despatches did he exhibit any settled plan of action, and that they did not carry conviction to the mind of any person to whom they were addressed. He thought there was an unreasonable amount of alarm as to the point which referred to the south side of the Lake of Geneva. Had this entire question been taken up when the option to do so was offered by Count Walewski last year, the Government would have been better able to meet the difficulties of the case than they were now, because at that time there had been no vote on the subject, whereas now there had been two votes which showed the feelings of the population—the first for the election of Members to the Sardinian Chambers, when five out of the six Deputies were in favour of annexation; and the other the vote by universal suffrage in favour of the annexation. He would not be suspected of thinking that any settled form of Government should be changed by any sudden ebullition of popular feeling and universal suffrage. The Government had, however, encouraged this mode of procedure in certain parts of Europe, and surely they would not say that an appeal to universal suffrage was only to be adopted in cases when it was directed against existing Sovereigns in Italy, and not to be applied to the case of Piedmont? The noble Marquess praised the despatches of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, but he would tell him that the despatch which in his opinion most merited praise was that in which he stated that if the King of Sardinia bargained away and sold the ancient cradle of his illustrious race it would for ever remain a blot on his escutcheon. He wished now to refer to some dates. On a former occasion, when he had put a question to his noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville) with reference to the rumoured annexation of Savoy to France, the answer was that the Government were in possession of no information on the subject, while it appeared that on that very day, the 27th of January, the first convention for the transfer of Nice and Savoy to France was signed. Now, if that were so, the act had been done some days previous to that on which Count Cavour made that unfortunate declaration to the effect that Sardinia would never either sell, barter, or exchange any portion of her territory. He might add that Earl Cowley, in his despatch of the 5th of February, stated that Count Walewski had informed him that if Sardinia were aggrandized by the acquisition of the Duchies, it must be at the cost of Savoy. He had, however, never been able to obtain any satisfactory explanation why that despatch did not arrive here until the 8th of February, thus taking three days instead of twelve hours to reach London from Paris. He had, however, put that question when our Ambassador was present in his place. He wished further to observe, that a despatch had been received at the same time from Sir James Hudson which contained a statement to the effect that he had had a conversation with Count Cavour, in the course of which Count Cavour had intimated that the Government of Sardinia had not the slightest intention of exchanging or selling Savoy. Now, that being so, he wished to know how his noble Friend (Earl Granville) had been enabled, in his observations in reply to a Motion which he (the Marquess of Normanby) had submitted to their Lordships on the 7th of February, to state the purport of a despatch from Turin which did not reach London until the following day?

EARL GRANVILLE: I may have got the intelligence by telegraph; but of this I am perfectly sure, that the information which I gave must in some way have reached the Government.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY: I should like to have some explanation with respect to the delay which occurred in the case of Earl Cowley's despatch of the 5th of February, which did not arrive until the 8th.

LORD WODEHOUSE observed that Earl Cowley frequently dated his despatches two or three days before he transmitted them to London. It should also be borne in mind that messengers did not start every day for the purpose of conveying them. The despatch was certainly received on the 8th.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY: He was at a loss to understand why upon the particular occasion to which he alluded—and that a most important one—a delay should have occurred of which he believed there was no similar instance. But, passing from that point, he wished to observe that, however anxious he might be to see the independence and neutrality secured, the despatch of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to Earl Cowley on the 15th of May did not quite meet his views on that important subject. He, therefore, hoped that if Her Majesty's Government entered into a Conference they would not insist upon a solution of the question, in advocating which it was evident they would not be supported by the other European Powers. As this would probably be the last opportunity which their Lordships would have of discussing the subject before Parliament re-assembled, he would say that he did not think Her Majesty's Government had approached this question in a proper manner, or at the proper time. In the autumn of last year they were engaged in endeavouring to abrogate the Treaty by which the peace of Europe had been established, and later on their action in their dealings with France was not a little embarrassed by the proceedings of the Financial Minister, whose schemes had for a time met with support, but now that the truth was known, they had been emphatically condemned by the country.

The Marquess of Normanby

LORD STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE said the subject which had been brought under the consideration of the House by the speech of the noble Lord who introduced the Motion, and of the noble Lord on the Ministerial Bench, was admittedly one of the most extensive and important that could engage the attention of their Lordships. He was nevertheless inclined to think that no disposition existed to entertain it at any considerable length; no one had yet risen from the Opposition benches, and nothing had occurred to give to the Debate a comprehensive character. What little he had to say might have been postponed, if that were not, as his noble Friend had just remarked, the last opportunity which would probably be offered of expressing an opinion with reference to this question in the present Session of Parliament. He admitted the force of some of the observations which had fallen from the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in support of the view taken by Her Majesty's Government; but at the same time the subject was so much beset with danger, in everything connected with it there were points of such great delicacy, and so little certainty existed as to the results of the Congress, that he must confess he should have been more gratified if he had learnt that there was an intention of coming to an understanding with France before any further steps were taken. On going into a Congress we should be exposed, by the line which we adopted, to the painful alternative either of appearing to give our sanction to the annexation of Savoy to France, or of increasing that coolness and estrangement which had lately taken place—he regretted to say, on very sufficient grounds—in the alliance with France, and thereby expose ourselves to inconveniences and incur hazards to which the country could not be blind. The nation was bound, as far as was consistent with the maintenance of its own interests and dignity and honour, to preserve that state of peace and friendly feeling which at present existed between this country and France; but he was unable to go to the same extent as his noble Friend, who, in opening the discussion, said that it was for the permanent advantage of this country to maintain a close alliance with France. If any receipt existed for producing constant quarrels in Europe it was, he believed, the attempt to bind together in bonds of constant alliance two countries, however connected their interests, which differed so widely in character and had such distinct aims and associations. In proportion to the endeavours made to keep up a constant, close, and formal alliance the tendency would inevitably be towards its severance. A consistent disposition to conciliate to the extent permitted by the honour and interest of both nations would, he conscientiously believed, be much more conducive to a lasting good understanding than such a close and intimate alliance as was contemplated by the noble Lord. The attitude to which he alluded did not prevent, and need never prevent, such occasional understandings as existed at this moment with regard to the course to be pursued in a distant part of the world, or which might exist with reference to another part of the globe not so remote, but still distant from this country. But it was his firm conviction that strict alliances were neither for the interest of England nor of France itself; a state of amity and mutual co-operation according to circumstances and the changes effected by time, would be a policy much more highly deserving of commendation. A Conference was stated to be required in the interests of Switzerland with a view to restore that country to that state of political security and neutrality which was guaranteed to it in the settlement of Europe in 1815. No man could admire more than he did the conduct of that distinguished confederacy. Connected as he had been in former times with that country, and having then had the opportunity of remarking the historical virtues of the people perpetuated through so many generations, and so nobly shown on every occasion when their rights or independence were assailed, he could not but feel satisfaction at the reasonable nature of their demand, and he trusted, therefore, that we should not overlook the obligations we had for stepping forth in defence of her rights, and for extending, as far as we properly could, consistently with the principles of non-intervention, the countenance of this country to the position which Switzerland had taken up. Though her name had been mentioned in the course of the Debate with respect and friendly feeling, he did not think justice had been done to the position in which she stood, or to the great qualities which her inhabitants had shown, partly from their own zeal and energy of purpose, and partly from the complicated situation of European affairs, in exposing themselves to positive danger. When they saw a country with such a limited population bringing forward 100,000 men ready to take the field, with a proportionate amount of artillery, (respecting the existence of which there could be no doubt, as not many years had elapsed since it made its appearance), and when they learnt on good authority that the Swiss were prepared to support that force if necessary by a fresh demonstration of equal magnitude, it was impossible, considering the extent of their means and the dangers to which they were exposed, not to entertain the highest opinion of that country. They were but exhibiting in the present day the same heroic firmness and the same attachment to their principles which centuries ago led them to place themselves in opposition to the enormous armies of Austria, to vindicate their independence, and to establish that confederacy which, in its long duration, had never failed to command the respect of Europe. It was impossible to deny that, in addition to the efforts of the Swiss, and to the prepossession we might have in their favour, the neutrality of Switzerland as guaranteed by the Treaties of Vienna was intimately connected with the interests of Europe. Undoubtedly the acquisition of Savoy by France altered the position of Switzerland towards Europe, and compromised the great European interests which were connected with her safety. He had never acquiesced in the opinion, formerly expressed in that House, that the acquisition of Savoy by France was a light matter, especially considering the degree of power to which France had attained—a degree of power which, if not exercised with the greatest discretion and with a regard for public principle, must place Europe in a state of jeopardy and alarm. Nothing which occurred to alter the relative proportion of one country in Europe to another could be so esteemed, and such annexation tended to keep Europe in a constant state of fever and anxiety. It was estimated that the population of Savoy was about half a million; such an addition to the population of France would not of itself affect the general interests of Europe; but the addition of a country like Savoy to France, the manner in which it had been carried out, and the motives assigned for it, undoubtedly gave grounds to Europe for mistrust and apprehension, lest similar projects might be entertained, and fully justified the alarm which Switzerland had expressed. Under these circumstances, all men naturally looked for some means for removing the causes of European anxiety, for giving security to Switzerland, and, if he saw any prospect of a conference bringing about those objects, he should be one of the first to support it. There was sufficient ground for apprehending, however, that whatever might be the hopes of the Government, and however anxious they might be to carry out their European policy, the result might be one which would increase the difficulties and complications of the situation. It might be that the alternative would be presented to us either of losing what remained to us of our friendly position towards France, or of appearing to give our sanction to an arrangement which would lead to the evil consequences he had already described. Before entering into a Conference we ought to have an understanding with France, that, if it should unfortunately be found impossible to effect an arrangement which would give security to Switzerland, at least we should not be taken to give our sanction to the principles on which the annexation of Savoy had taken place.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he entirely approved the decision of the Government to enter into a Conference. He had always expressed his disapprobation of this annexation, from its origin in a war without a pretext and without a justification to its accomplishment; and, though he allowed that the Savoyards and the Nizzards had the fullest right to manage their own affairs, to have what sovereign they chose without foreign interference, yet that was a very different thing from admitting their right to annex themselves to a foreign Power, even by an unanimous vote fully and fairly taken, which he could not allow had been the case in this instance. Nothing would be worse than that the annexation should take place against the wishes of the people; but their wishes for it gave no ground for other Powers agreeing to that annexation. He did not believe that France had gained any such additional strength, either strategical or territorial, as need give any material ground to the other Powers for objecting to it; nevertheless, the assent of the other Powers ought to be sought, and the means of giving it would, no doubt, form a fit subject for discussion in the Conference. Much complaint was made on the other side of the water of France being suspected; but the best way for a country to avoid being suspected was to pursue a course of conduct which was not suspicious. A constant good understanding between France and England was the greatest blessing which could happen to both countries and to the peace of the world in general. A strict alliance between them was a very different matter, though there might be occasions when it would be of the greatest importance that they should act in alliance with each other. He hoped nothing would interfere with the present peace of Europe, but the best course to render that peace secure was a cordial understanding between those countries which suspected a certain other Power, or felt it necessary to be on their guard against it, and in each of those countries at home an unceasing, vigilant, and strenuous preparation for the worst that might happen.

Lord Stratford de Redcliffe

Motion agreed to.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION BILL. COMMITTEE NEGATIVED.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

LORD RAVENSWORTH, who said he had taken charge of this Bill at the request of the Archbishop of York, moved that the House resolve itself into Committee. The clauses of the Bill were a portion of the Government Bill on the same subject which was in the other House; but it was to be feared that that Bill would not come up to their Lordships in time to be passed into law. The present measure was therefore proposed in order to provide a remedy for an evil which had been acknowledge, and he did not anticipate that the Government would oppose clauses which they had already adopted.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER said that, as a Member of the Ecclesiastical Commission, he should oppose the further progress of the Bill. Since it passed the second reading an opportunity had been given for considering what would be the certain effects of the measure. He admitted that the object which the Bill had in view was in itself perfectly just, provided it could be carried out without injury to existing interests. But the Bill would create very heavy charges upon the estates of the Commissioners without making any provision to meet those charges, and would, in fact, create charges which the resources of the present Commissioners would not be able to meet. He must, therefore, move an Amendment that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out "now," and insert "this day three months."

On Question, That "now" stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the Negative; and House to be in Committee on this Day Three Months.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, July 16, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Militia Ballot.

2^o Landed Property Improvement (Ireland); Local Government Supplemental (No. 2); Theatres and Public Houses; Bank of Ireland (No. 2); Manchester Cathedral Church.

3^o Postage (Army and Navy); Nuisances Removal and Diseases Prevention; Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act (1853) Amendment; Crown Debts and Judgments; Inclosure (No. 2).

VACCINE BOARD.—QUESTION.

MR. BRADY said, he wished to ask, if it be the intention of the Government to institute a Vaccine Board in Dublin similar to that which exists in London? He would also beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if his attention has been directed to the fact that the Board of the Cow Pock Institution of Dublin charges 2s. 6d. for two ivory-charged points of vaccine lymph to medical men, whilst the said Board receives an annual grant of £400 for the better supply of pure lymph for the protection of the people?

MR. CARDWELL replied that the institution referred to was one which received a Grant from Parliament, its object being the gratuitous vaccination of the poor; but it charged private persons 2s. 6d. for vaccine lymph. It supplied Medical Practitioners at 10s. 6d. and Union Workhouses at £1 1s. a year.

DEANERY OF YORK.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that the Income of the Deanery of York has been increased; and, if so, when, and from what time; what was the reason for that increase, and out of what Fund was it made; and whether any record is kept of the names of the Commissioners who attend and vote at the meetings of the Commission?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Income of the Deanery of York had been increased out of the Common Fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners £2,000 a year, by an Order in Council dated the 10th of May last, and printed in the London Gazette of Wednesday, the 16th of May. The reason for that increase was a report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and it was the fact that the names of the Commissioners who were present at any meeting of the Commission were recorded.

FORESHORE AT PEMBROKE DOCK.

QUESTION.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, if he can state whether the Fore-shore sold at Pembroke Dock by the Woods and Forests five or six years ago was sold with or without consultation with the Admiralty, and with or without its approbation; and whether any inquiries had since been made with a view to the repurchase of the same?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that in 1854 certain parties proposed to purchase a piece of land near Pembroke Dockyard, and the Admiralty of that day consented to the purchase being made. Those parties were then prevented by circumstances from carrying out that purchase, but in 1858 they again proposed to complete their purchase. The matter having got into Chancery, some delays took place. In 1858, when the proposal was again made, the Admiralty refused their consent, but it was only fair to state that the Master in Chancery, in whose hands the case had been placed, overruled the objections of the Admiralty, and bound them by their former agreement of 1854; so that in fact this piece of land was purchased contrary to the wish of the Admiralty. There was no intention, however, on the part of the Admiralty to re-purchase it from the parties who now possessed it.

THE BRONZE COINAGE.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Bronze Coinage will be issued?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that owing to the casual absence of the Master of the Mint in the country, he was unable to answer the question with certainty, but he had no doubt that in the course of a day or two he should be able to give the hon. Gentleman the information which he desired. The hon. Gentleman was probably aware that the delay which had arisen was referable to a mysterious secret of art.

SUPPLY.—THE CHINA WAR.—REPORT.

Resolution reported.

"That a sum, not exceeding £443,896, be granted to Her Majesty, for Repayment to the Government of India of Advances on account of former Expeditions to China."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: It was my intention to have availed myself of this opportunity to notice certain personal references to myself and my colleagues which were made on a former evening by the noble Lord the Prime Minister and the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs after I had accidentally left the House. I extremely regret that now, at the usual hour for public business (half-past four o'clock), neither of those noble Lords are in their places, and I am therefore unable to proceed with the defence of myself and my colleagues from the imputations which were most undeservedly thrown upon us by both of them. I beg leave to give notice that as the somewhat unusual absence of those noble Lords prevents my making the remarks which I intended to have addressed to the House,

Lord Clarence Paget

I shall upon a future day call their attention and that of the House to this subject.

SIR GEORGE GREY: The observations made by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs were made in answer to the noble the Member for Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) in his presence, and in the presence of other Gentlemen who had been colleagues of the right hon. Baronet. So far as they contained any allusion to the right hon. Baronet, formerly First Lord of the Admiralty, they were only a repetition in a few sentences of what the noble Lord had said in answer to the right hon. Baronet, and in his presence, a few nights before.

MR. ROEBUCK: As I do not think that the honour of England depends upon the presence or absence of either of the noble Lords I am going to make a few observations upon this Vote. The Vote is to provide for the expenses of the last, and it is connected with the present war in China. Now, I do not want either war to go past without a distinct protest on the part of one Member at least of this House, against its justice. I believe that the House is with me, and I believe that the people of England are with me upon this occasion. They have been misled, but they are not now misled, and if they once understood the origin of this war—for what we carry it on we cannot learn from that (the Treasury) Bench—I think they would be of opinion, as they are of opinion, that this war is utterly indefensible on the ground either of the interest or the honour of England. How did this war begin? It began with an attempt on the part of this country to promote the smuggling of opium. Here comes a very distinct inquiry as to the character of the Chinese, and that of the English people. Now, it is a very curious fact that the Chinese people have no desire to have any communication with us. We have thrust ourselves upon them. The restless spirit of English adventure has led us to China, and we have, thereupon, endeavoured to force our manufactures and our commerce upon a people who entirely repudiate all dealing with us. Now, I want the people of England to recognize with regard to the Chinese the feelings which they entertain with regard to themselves. What would they think if the Chinese said, "We will go to Liverpool and introduce into that port something the entry of which is forbidden?" Suppose that we had arrived at such a point of civilization that we wished not to see our people drunk, and that we desired to have no importation of arrack. Arrack is made by the Chinese, and opium by the English. Suppose that the people of England desired that no arrack should be imported into Liverpool, but that the Chinese were powerful enough to bring their ships to that port and to introduce arrack in spite of us, what would the people of England say? They would say that these were a barbarous people endeavouring to force upon us, a Christian people, the means of intoxicating our population and rendering them miserable. That is what the Chinese said, and when they said it we turned round upon them and said, "You are a barbarous people." We imported opium, they seized, confiscated, and destroyed that opium, and we, employing the force which what we call civilization gives us, compelled them to pay for it and to enter into a treaty of peace with us. This, Sir, was all before the occurrence of that memorable circumstance at Canton. Now, I recollect that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Secretary for War, and the noble Lord the Member for London, all expended violent eloquence in describing the horrible abominations of the conduct of the English. Then it was that we bombarded Canton. The right hon. Gentleman asked for what? He never got an answer to that inquiry; I never got an answer to that inquiry. I inquired then, as I inquired the other night, for what was that Chinese war intended,—what did we expect to get by it? The other night I asked the right hon. Gentleman, "If the bombardment of Canton so excited your indignation, how can you support the Administration in asking for these four millions of money to carry on this war?" The right hon. Gentleman said that circumstances had altered. Now, I want to know how they have altered? Let us understand the case. We bombarded Canton and compelled the Chinese to enter into a treaty. The force of cannon cannot be resisted, and they yielded, and said certain things in their treaty. Among others, an Ambassador was to go to Peking. The noble Lord at the head of the Administration said that when our Ambassador arrived at the mouth of the Peiho treachery was practised towards us. Now, there was no treachery. Stakes were driven across the mouth of the river, and we were told that those stakes were not to be drawn up. We attempted to draw them up; guns were in consequence of that attempt fired upon us from the shore, and we were beaten. I want to know from the right hon. Gentleman wherein the circumstances have altered. According to the violent eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman the origin of that war was unjust. We by superior force compelled the Chinese to make a treaty. Does that alter the character of the origin of the war, which, according to the right hon. Gentleman himself, was unjust? The Chinese entered into a treaty which stipulated that an English Ambassador should reside in Peking. We determined to go by one way; the people of China said we should go by another. We attempted to carry our determination into effect, but we failed to do so; and now we are sending out thousands of men and spending millions of money in order to enforce a treaty, the origin of which, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was unjust. I want to know what has taken place since to render that just which was originally unjust, and to induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in passing from one bench to another, to support that in office which he so eloquently denounced in Opposition. It appears to me that the interests of the people of England, on this question of war with China, are entirely neglected. We are supposed to be at the head of civilization, and to represent justice, mercy, and Christianity. I believe all three are overlooked on the present occasion. Justice, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, was violated by our proceedings in China. We bombarded an innocent city, and we, having superior power at our command, compelled the Chinese Government to enter into a treaty which it desired not to enter into. The noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office said on a former occasion we should have no end of the Chinese war. His vaticination has been verified. We shall have no end to the war or to the expense connected with it. England bleeds at every pore—in money and in honour—and the people of England are entirely neglected by the Government: we are degraded by the Ministry which leads us; everything that can possibly militate against humanity and morality is supported by the occupants of the Treasury bench; and we are now setting an example to the world of western civilization entirely opposed to the principles of justice, teaching an Eastern people to believe that Western civilization is Western cruelty and murder. I charge the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his two noble Colleagues—I charge the right hon. Secretary for war—with having on this question deserted their duty. They began right, but they have changed; and the change which has taken place in them is the result, I fear, of a change in their situation. That which was wrong when they were on the Opposition benches is right now they are on the Treasury benches. It is clear that upon this question honour, justice, and truth are neglected. Ministers defend that which in Opposition they denounced. They are the supporters of murder, of dishonour, of dishonesty, of lying, of everything which when in Opposition they condemned.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am far from deprecating further discussion on this great question, either by the hon. and learned Gentleman or by any other Member of this House. I admit it is a question which can hardly be too much discussed, and with respect to which it is desirable that the people of England should possess the fullest information. I am glad when I hear the hon. and learned Gentleman address himself to the subject, because, however I may deny the justice of his attacks and incriminations, however I may think his arguments cannot be maintained, yet I cannot help respecting the principles upon which he treats it, and his disposition to hold that in our dealings with Eastern and feeble nations we should be as regardful of the principles of truth and fair play as if we were dealing with the most powerful and formidable nations of Europe. I shall not attempt to follow the hon. and learned Gentleman at present, because I think that as respects the merits of the quarrel in which we are most unhappily engaged with China, it is not possible to appreciate them without a very exact and careful consideration of dates and documents, to which the hon. and learned Gentleman has, indeed, alluded, but in terms so general that I think his conclusions are not entitled to the reliance which might otherwise be placed in them. To one principle, however, which the hon. and learned Gentleman has recorded, I must, on the other hand, enter my protest. He states that the war which led to the Treaty of Tientsin was in its origin tainted on our part with injustice, and that the treaty itself was yielded by the Chinese to superior force. Upon those points, I am still disposed to agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman; but he infers, if I understand him aright, from the fact that our case was not sound in the origin of the war, that we are neither bound nor entitled to enforce the Treaty of Tientsin, and that the Chinese on their part are not bound to observe it. In that proposition I cannot concur. I believe the Treaty of Tientsin stands a good and valid international compact. I do not mean to say that if it were a question of pressing to extremes all the terms of that treaty it would not be required by prudence, and even by justice and humanity, to use mildness in the enforcement of those terms, out of a liberal regard to the relative positions of the parties. But I do say that that is not the question upon which we have been at issue with China. The question has been, not whether the treaty has been mercilessly enforced on our part, but whether a treaty which has received in a public declaration the approbation in all its parts of the Emperor of China, should or should not be ratified in the capital of the Chinese empire. That is the question at issue, and the hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that the ratification of the Treaty of Tientsin is the primary object for which the Government have thought it to be their duty to resort to force. As respects the question how far notice was given to us that our Ambassador was not to proceed to Peking by way of the Peiho—how far we were entitled to use the main road of the empire—how far we were deceived with regard to the fortifications at the mouth of the river, I shall say nothing now, because, as I have stated, I think in order to be fairly judged they must be judged by careful and exact reference to documents, requiring an amount of time which certainly I am not prepared to give at the present moment, and to which the House would not be prepared to listen when it has met for the consideration of other, and, at the same time, very important business. The right hon. Gentleman then stated, in further reply to the question about the issue of the new coinage, that he had just received an official report from the Master of the Mint, informing him that the Mint was prepared to proceed with the striking of the coin almost immediately, but that some time must necessarily elapse after the striking of the coin had begun before the issue could be commenced. About two months would be occupied in accumulating a sufficient number of the new coin to enable the Mint to supply the public demand.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. Roebuck

LATE SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

RESOLUTION MOVED.

Order for Committee (Ways and Means) read.

Motion made and Question proposed. "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. NEWDEGATE, pursuant to notice, rose to move—

"That the Rules against proceeding with opposed Notices and Orders after a quarter before Six o'clock on Wednesdays, under the Standing Order of the 19th of July, 1854, be applied to all business standing for Evening Sittings, upon which debate shall arise after One o'clock in the morning during the remainder of the Session."

The hon. Gentleman said the importance of the subject which he had ventured to bring before the House would furnish his excuse for interposing in the progress of the business which stood on the paper for that evening. The number of hours during which the House had sat each day of late, and during the last fortnight especially, in addition to the labour of attending Committees, rendered the matter of much interest to every Member and especially to the Speaker, for whose great exertions during these protracted sittings the House must feel grateful; it was a matter of congratulation that the right hon. Gentleman's health had not suffered in consequence. He felt much diffidence as an individual in bringing this subject before the House; but, perhaps, the fact of his having held for five years one of those nameless but important offices, the due discharge of the functions of which so materially affected the action of the House, had rendered it necessary for him to watch closely the proceedings of the House, might give him some claim upon their attention on the present occasion. Looking at the state of business before the House and to the duration of their sittings, especially during the last fortnight, he foresaw that the measures set down for consideration were likely to be hurried forward during the remainder of the Session in a manner to preclude the possibility of anything like a fair amount of deliberation being given to them. He held in his hand a Return of the number of hours the House had sat from Thursday, the 28th of June, to Thursday, the 12th of July. It appeared from this document that the labours of Members were thus engaged:—

VOL. CLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

Days.		Adj.	Length of Sitting.
Th., June 28	No morn. sitting	2½ a.m.	10½ hrs.
F. June 29	Morn. sitting	2 a.m.	12 "
M. July 2	No morn. sitting	2½ a.m.	10½ "
Tu. July 3	Morn. sitting	8½ p.m.	6½ "
W. July 4	Morn. sitting	6 p.m.	8 "
Th. July 5	No morn. sitting	2½ a.m.	10½ "
F. July 6	Morn. sitting	3 a.m.	13 "
M. July 9	No morn. sitting	2½ a.m.	10½ "
Tu. July 10	Morn. sitting	1½ a.m.	11½ "
W. July 11	Morn. sitting	6 p.m.	6 "
Th. July 12	Morn. sitting	4 a.m.	14 "

On Friday last he believed the House did not adjourn until 2½ a.m. having sat 13 hours. The Notice Paper for that day contained the longest list of Notices within the memory of the oldest Member—it contained no less than 52 Orders of the Day. It appeared to him therefore they were not likely to devote to even a quarter of the business before them anything like reasonable deliberation, nor to continue those protracted sittings with common justice to themselves or due regard to the character of the House. In making those observations he did not intend to cast any undue reflection on the Government, who were no doubt pressed at that period of the year to pass their measures as rapidly as possible and to make up for lost time. Nevertheless, if such a mass of Bills as that presented to them was persevered with, it would be impossible to give them due deliberation, he, therefore, thought that the character of that House as a deliberative assembly was much endangered by the continuance of a system under which such a pressure was imposed. The number of hours which they sat in that House did not represent the amount of labour hon. Members had to go through. They had to communicate with their constituencies, to carry on a wide correspondence, and to devote some time to the study of those subjects before Parliament in order to render them fully competent to discharge their functions properly. In the Motion which he should submit to the House he proposed no absolute limit when the adjournment should take place, as the establishment of a limit of that kind might encourage a practice of speaking against time. What he suggested was, that debates arising previous to one o'clock in the morning should not be interrupted, but that no new debate should be originated after that hour. Under the existing system many of their most experienced and assiduous Members, utterly exhausted by protracted sittings, were compelled to retire at twelve or one o'clock at night, and to leave the most important questions in which they took the greatest interest to be dealt with by a comparatively small number of Members, who, perhaps, represented only a one-sided and partial view of those questions. It should be further recollected, that owing to the fatigue of the Reporters and the limitation of space in the public journals, it was impossible for the public press to publish those past-midnight discussions in such a manner as to convey an accurate idea of the debates of the House. Under such circumstances, the ordinary channel, through which public opinion was elicited and reacted upon the House, was thus cut off, and the House was liable to become the mere registry office for the decrees of the Government, or any sufficiently powerful faction. The proceedings of Parliament at the close of the Session had on several occasions become a mere byword. One hon. Member who had represented a large constituency and was held in much esteem by the House (the late Mr. Brotherton) had made it his special function to interpose at a reasonable hour of the night for the purpose of relieving representatives from their labours. That hon. Member was now no more, and the matter was now taken up by hands too feeble to do justice to it. If that House desired to maintain its character as a deliberative assembly it must insist on not sitting so many hours that Members were necessarily precluded from previously considering the subjects submitted to their consideration. The Government, notwithstanding their means for ensuring an attendance of supporters, were rendered liable, through the paucity of attendance, to be influenced by faction in the most objectionable form. The House, he thought, ought to insist upon not being compelled to sit so many hours as they had been called upon to do lately. Such a system reduced that assembly to a mere skeleton after one o'clock, and exposed the Government to the vexatious opposition of small sections who, influenced, perhaps, by factious or personal motives, often sought to impose, and sometimes succeeded in imposing, upon Her Majesty's Ministers the most objectionable terms.

MR. BARROW seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'the

Mr. Newdegate

Rules against proceeding with opposed Notices and Orders after a quarter before Six of the clock on Wednesdays, under the Standing Order of the 19th day of July, 1854, be applied to all business standing for Evening Sittings, upon which debate shall arise after One of the clock in the morning during the remainder of the Session.' "

—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the subject to which attention had been drawn was, no doubt, one of considerable importance, and looking back at the late hours to which the House had sat during the last fortnight, he was not surprised that the hon. Gentleman had brought it forward. It was, indeed, well deserving of consideration whether by the lengthened sittings which had of late prevailed too great a pressure was not put, not only upon Members, but upon the officers of the House. Still he thought it would be very indiscreet to adopt a stringent rule for the purpose of checking the present practice. The hon. Gentleman suggested that the rule existing on Wednesdays in regard to opposed Orders should be adopted generally on all the evenings of the week. But it should be remembered that on Wednesdays the House rose by a Standing Order at six o'clock, whatever business might be proceeding, and it was obvious that great inconvenience would ensue if on those occasions debates were carried on till six o'clock; and therefore the rule was adopted that any debate in progress at a quarter to six should be stopped and no opposed Order taken afterwards, with a view to leave a margin for the unopposed business. But towards the end of the Session it would become absolutely necessary to take some business which might be opposed after one o'clock in the morning. If the hon. Gentleman's Resolution were adopted, it would enable any Member to postpone any Order by merely declaring that he opposed it. The other morning, five divisions took place on the Motion to introduce the Peace Preservation Act Continuance Bill (Ireland), and the Resolution now proposed would have enabled the very small minority on that occasion successfully to prevent the introduction of the Bill. The House ought certainly to exercise moderation in the hours to which it sat, and opposed business should not, except in cases of necessity, be taken at a very late hour. But neither ought the House to tie its hands in every case by a rule of this kind. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman would not press his Motion to a division, or that if he did it would not be adopted by the House, for if carried it would lead to great inconvenience by the obstruction of public business, and it would only prolong the period, to which they were all now looking forward, when they would be released from their duties by the prorogation.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that whether the hon. Member pressed his Motion to a division or not, he thought the House was much indebted to him for forcing attention to the subject; for nothing could exceed the unsatisfactory manner in which the public business was at present conducted. The Government, who seemed to be now in the habit of withdrawing most of their important measures, constantly put down on the paper Bills which they must feel they would have to withdraw; and other important Bills were brought on under circumstances which rendered it impossible to discuss them properly. For example, the Government gave a pledge that the Poor Law Board Continuance Bill should be brought on at a time which would allow of its ample discussion, and accordingly it came on at twenty minutes to two o'clock last Friday morning. The Corporation of London Reform Bill had been before the House about three months, and had been on the paper, he believed, thirty-two times. Whenever the Government seemed to have nothing better to do, this miserable measure was appointed for discussion, and then postponed every night, not the slightest suggestion being given to Members or others interested in the subject. Night after night Aldermen were brought down from the City, and though it was said there that the Bill must necessarily be withdrawn, its continuance among the Orders occasioned great practical inconvenience. Then there was the Theatres and Public-houses Bill, which was one of considerable importance. This measure was read a first time at a little before three o'clock on Saturday morning, and now the House was asked to assent to the second reading this evening. Altogether, the mode in which public business was now being conducted was utterly unsatisfactory.

COLONEL SYKES complained of the course taken with regard to the East India Stock Transfer, &c. Bill, a measure of great importance to the East India Company, who had petitioned to be heard by counsel against it. This Bill was the 24th Order on the paper for that evening.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE admitted that Members were now kept in the House till a very late and disagreeable hour; and there was to-night a list of Orders which was the longest, he believed, within the recollection of the oldest Member. But there was an immense mass of business which it was absolutely necessary to dispose of before the prorogation. The reason why all these Bills had accumulated was obvious. One subject at present occupied the attention of the House until twelve or one in the morning; it was debated, and perhaps properly debated, at great length; and then, and not before, came the ordinary business of the sitting, and it was a constant practice now for Members to object to going on with any matters requiring discussion at that period of the evening. The hon. Gentleman's remedy for this state of things would be no remedy at all—it would increase the evil, instead of diminishing it. At present, by dint of severe pressure, some of the necessary Bills of the Session were advanced a stage every night; but if the Resolution were carried, it was a question if any business would be done whatever; any one Member would be able indefinitely to obstruct the progress of a Bill; and though complaints were now sometimes made that the majority were too much in the hands of the minority, under the new system the minority would be armed with absolute power. One cause of complaint had not hitherto been brought under notice. The Lords were in the habit of passing a Resolution every Session, declaring that they would entertain no Bill which was not read a second time by a certain day. That Resolution was, he believed, in part the cause of the present unsatisfactory state of public business. Measures were now brought in early in the Session, in order that they might go to the other House before the fatal day; and business, instead of being distributed over the Session, was all crowded together till something like a dead lock ensued. He looked upon this comparatively recent practice as a great infringement of the privileges of the Commons. Suppose the House of Commons were to pass a similar Resolution, would not the Peers have a just right to complain? The constitutional duty of both Houses was to receive every Bill sent to them at whatever period of the Session, and to pass them if they were proper Bills. This was one of the causes of the evil which had now been growing for many years; but if the Resolution were passed, he believed the House of Commons would be unable to transact any business whatever.

LORD LOVAINE said, the duty of the Lords was to consider properly the Bills sent up to them. How were they to do this if the House of Commons, after passing nearly the whole Session in deliberating, sent up Bills at a period when only the most cursory examination of their provisions by the Lords was possible? He thought the Lords had done well in attempting to make the Commons consider their legislative measures, instead of spending their time in discussing matters that were of comparatively trifling importance. As long as the other House existed, due opportunities of deliberation ought, at least, to be afforded it, pending the course of revolution which some hon. Members opposite seemed anxious to engage in.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Even now a minority has great power to obstruct the progress of business; but according to our existing rules the minority must consist of several Members; if the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Warwickshire be adopted, it will give an absolute veto to any single Member as to all business after one o'clock. Now, as every Bill, however innocuous, has some one enemy in this House, it seems to me that any Gentleman who objects to any Bill has only to stop here till one o'clock in order to be able to put an end to all further business. Practically this Resolution would enact that at that hour we must invariably close the proceedings of this House. I have heard propositions made at different times in different forms with a view to a compulsory closing of the business of this House at a certain hour. We all know the inconvenience of long sittings, but the House has always come to the conclusion that it is better to trust to the discretion of Members than to lay down an invariable and inflexible rule, and I hope the House will come to the same conclusion now. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone has made great complaints of the mode in which the Government have conducted their business this Session, and he seems to think there has been something new and unprecedented in the course we have adopted. I can only say we have pursued the same course as is always pursued by the Government. With respect to the London Corporation Reform Bill there has been a necessity for postponing it, and it is not the first or only measure that has been postponed. I have used every exertion to bring it on without success, and I can only express my regret if any Gentlemen have been inconvenienced by my not being able to proceed with it before this time. I had only the option to postpone it or to discharge the Order, and I did not think I was justified in asking that the Order should be discharged. The hon. and learned Member also referred to a Bill relating to theatres and wine licences. That Bill was introduced by me in consequence of an express understanding which had been come to in this House with the hon. Member for Southwark. The Bill now stands for second reading to-night, but if more time is required for considering it I am willing to postpone it. I do not see how that involves any censure upon me. The hon. and learned Member also states that the Government, contrary to an express promise, proceeded with the Poor Law Continuance Bill at half-past two. I believe that Bill was brought in at half-past twelve [Mr. EDWIN JAMES:—"Half-past one"]. I am assured it was only half-past twelve, and I think the House will agree that for a Continuance Bill at this period of the Session that is not an unreasonable hour.

Mr. E. P. Bouverie

MR. DISRAELI: I have no wish to enter into any recrimination as to the business of this House; but it appears to me that there is one remedy for the existing evil which might be adopted with good effect. What I would suggest is, that Her Majesty's Government should make up their minds now as to what Bills they will proceed with during the present Session. Is it not unreasonable to ask the Government to adopt that course. The business of the House during the present Session has been of no ordinary character; and though, as appears from our papers, it has been only imperfectly transacted, we must remember that very important financial propositions were brought forward, and it is impossible for the Government to dispose of their other measures in a satisfactory manner till their financial business has been gone through. Until their money business is concluded, they cannot exercise that control over the other business of the House which it is desirable they should exercise. Besides, this Session has been a very peculiar one. We had one financial statement that led to many considerable measures; but that, unfortunately—it is not for me now to enter into the causes why—was an imperfect financial statement, and did not place the House in possession of the monetary position of the country. To-night we are to have another financial statement, which will lead to other measures; and I must remind the House that all of those consequent on the first have not yet been passed. It is therefore quite impossible at this period of the year that we can expect all the important Bills now on the paper to be dealt with satisfactorily. I see on this evening's list the Highways Bill, the Ecclesiastical Commission Bill, the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill—all measures of very great weight, I cannot see any prospect of proceeding with all those Bills; and I think Her Majesty's Government ought to make up their minds as soon as possible, and communicate to the House the decision to which they shall have arrived with the least possible delay. I cannot agree with the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), who on these subjects is very properly considered to be an authority, that the press of business in this House is aggravated by a rule of the Lords. I cannot think that the rule of the Lords which, after all, admits of second readings till the end of the month, has had any ill effect. I cannot but think that the effect of the rule has, on the whole, been salutary. I cannot see that its effect has been to make the Government introduce all their Bills at the beginning of the Session; because I see that many of those now on the paper have been only recently introduced. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), I cannot support it, because in my opinion it would only add to difficulties, to extricate ourselves from which we must depend on the good sense of the House and the management of its chief Members. There is only one other remedy—the application to the House of the provisions of the Factory Act might produce an immediate effect. But I prefer to wait another Session before adopting such a course, and in the mean time to trust to the good sense of hon. Members themselves.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—I quite concur with the right hon. Gentleman that it will be necessary for the Government attentively to look over these measures, to see—not which can be postponed without inconvenience to the public service, for I think they are all desirable—but which are least urgent, and may with the least amount of inconvenience be postponed to another Session. Indeed, the subject has already in some degree occupied the attention of the Government, and I hope upon an early day to state the result of our deliberations. The right hon. Gentleman has stated truly enough that this has been a very peculiar Session; and I must remind the House that almost all these important and useful measures were introduced at an early period, only one, I think—the Amalgamation of Forces in India—having been introduced since Easter. It is not the fault of the Government that these important measures have not been proceeded with. In the first place, we had the French Treaty; then the Budget and the measures connected with it; and then, as all Gentlemen will remember, there was a good deal of time consumed in discussing the Reform Bill. I mention that without intending to cast any reproach upon those who contributed to that consumption of time, but simply to prove that it is not from want of exertion on the part of the Government that many at least of these useful measures have not been disposed of. I concur with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that the Motion before us is not one which it is expedient we should adopt. In fact, I think it would be unwise for this House to bind itself unnecessarily by a fixed rule. We have rules enough already, which are mainly devised to protect a minority, however small, against an overbearing majority; and, although the Government of the day has usually no reason to be particularly pleased with the use that is sometimes made of these rules at three or four o'clock in the morning, yet even that rule, which puts it in the power of any small number of Members to impede, if not to stop business, has the value of protecting a minority against an overbearing majority. Therefore, upon general grounds, I am disposed to object to an innovation of this kind,* and, with the quantity of business we have now to transact, it seems to me it would be unwise to fetter ourselves in the way proposed. It is an inevitable consequence if you have a great deal of business to transact, and only a limited time to transact it in, that you must sit late—

“For the best of all ways to lengthen our days
Is to steal a few hours from the night, my Boys.”

There are many Gentlemen who, if they were not engaged here, would probably be equally out of bed at those hours, and possibly employed in ways not so conducive to the public interest.

MR. HENLEY observed that no one could accuse the noble Lord at the head of the Government of inattention to his du-

LORD LOVAINE said, the duty of the Lords was to consider properly the Bills sent up to them. How were they to do this if the House of Commons, after passing nearly the whole Session in deliberating, sent up Bills at a period when only the most cursory examination of their provisions by the Lords was possible? He thought the Lords had done well in attempting to make the Commons consider their legislative measures, instead of spending their time in discussing matters that were of comparatively trifling importance. As long as the other House existed, due opportunities of deliberation ought, at least, to be afforded it, pending the course of revolution which some hon. Members opposite seemed anxious to engage in.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Even now a minority has great power to obstruct the progress of business; but according to our existing rules the minority must consist of several Members; if the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Warwickshire be adopted, it will give an absolute veto to any single Member as to all business after one o'clock. Now, as every Bill, however innocuous, has some one enemy in this House, it seems to me that any Gentleman who objects to any Bill has only to stop here till one o'clock in order to be able to put an end to all further business. Practically this Resolution would enact that at that hour we must invariably close the proceedings of this House. I have heard propositions made at different times in different forms with a view to a compulsory closing of the business of this House at a certain hour. We all know the inconvenience of long sittings, but the House has always come to the conclusion that it is better to trust to the discretion of Members than to lay down an invariable and inflexible rule, and I hope the House will come to the same conclusion now. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone has made great complaints of the mode in which the Government have conducted their business this Session, and he seems to think there has been something new and unprecedented in the course we have adopted. I can only say we have pursued the same course as is always pursued by the Government. With respect to the London Corporation Reform Bill there has been a necessity for postponing it, and it is not the first or only measure that has been postponed. I have used every exertion to bring it on without success, and I can only express my regret if any Gentlemen have been inconvenienced by my not being able to proceed with it before this time. I had only the option to postpone it or to discharge the Order, and I did not think I was justified in asking that the Order should be discharged. The hon. and learned Member also referred to a Bill relating to theatres and wine licences. That Bill was introduced by me in consequence of an express understanding which had been come to in this House with the hon. Member for Southwark. The Bill now stands for second reading to-night, but if more time is required for considering it I am willing to postpone it. I do not see how that involves any censure upon me. The hon. and learned Member also states that the Government, contrary to an express promise, proceeded with the Poor Law Continuance Bill at half-past two. I believe that Bill was brought in at half-past twelve [Mr. EDWIN JAMES:—"Half-past one"]. I am assured it was only half-past twelve, and I think the House will agree that for a Continuance Bill at this period of the Session that is not an unreasonable hour.

Mr. E. P. Bouverie

MR. DISRAELI: I have no wish to enter into any recrimination as to the business of this House; but it appears to me that there is one remedy for the existing evil which might be adopted with good effect. What I would suggest is, that Her Majesty's Government should make up their minds now as to what Bills they will proceed with during the present Session. Is it not unreasonable to ask the Government to adopt that course. The business of the House during the present Session has been of no ordinary character; and though, as appears from our papers, it has been only imperfectly transacted, we must remember that very important financial propositions were brought forward, and it is impossible for the Government to dispose of their other measures in a satisfactory manner till their financial business has been gone through. Until their money business is concluded, they cannot exercise that control over the other business of the House which it is desirable they should exercise. Besides, this Session has been a very peculiar one. We had one financial statement that led to many considerable measures; but that, unfortunately—it is not for me now to enter into the causes why—was an imperfect financial statement, and did not place the House in possession of the monetary position of the country. To-night we are to have another financial statement, which will lead to other measures; and I must remind the House that all of those consequent on the first have not yet been passed. It is therefore quite impossible at this period of the year that we can expect all the important Bills now on the paper to be dealt with satisfactorily. I see on this evening's list the Highways Bill, the Ecclesiastical Commission Bill, the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill—all measures of very great weight, I cannot see any prospect of proceeding with all those Bills; and I think Her Majesty's Government ought to make up their minds as soon as possible, and communicate to the House the decision to which they shall have arrived with the least possible delay. I cannot agree with the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), who on these subjects is very properly considered to be an authority, that the press of business in this House is aggravated by a rule of the Lords. I cannot think that the rule of the Lords which, after all, admits of second readings till the end of the month, has had any ill effect. I cannot but think that the effect of the rule has, on the whole, been salutary. I cannot see that its effect has been to make the Government introduce all their Bills at the beginning of the Session; because I see that many of those now on the paper have been only recently introduced. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), I cannot support it, because in my opinion it would only add to difficulties, to extricate ourselves from which we must depend on the good sense of the House and the management of its chief Members. There is only one other remedy—the application to the House of the provisions of the Factory Act might produce an immediate effect. But I prefer to wait another Session before adopting such a course, and in the mean time to trust to the good sense of hon. Members themselves.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—I quite concur with the right hon. Gentleman that it will be necessary for the Government attentively to look over these measures, to see—not which can be postponed without inconvenience to the public service, for I think they are all desirable—but which are least urgent, and may with the least amount of inconvenience be postponed to another Session. Indeed, the subject has already in some degree occupied the attention of the Government, and I hope upon an early day to state the result of our deliberations. The right hon. Gentleman has stated truly enough that this has been a very peculiar Session; and I must remind the House that almost all these important and useful measures were introduced at an early period, only one, I think—the Amalgamation of Forces in India—having been introduced since Easter. It is not the fault of the Government that these important measures have not been proceeded with. In the first place, we had the French Treaty; then the Budget and the measures connected with it; and then, as all Gentlemen will remember, there was a good deal of time consumed in discussing the Reform Bill. I mention that without intending to cast any reproach upon those who contributed to that consumption of time, but simply to prove that it is not from want of exertion on the part of the Government that many at least of these useful measures have not been disposed of. I concur with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that the Motion before us is not one which it is expedient we should adopt. In fact, I think it would be unwise for this House to bind itself unnecessarily by a fixed rule. We have rules enough already, which are mainly devised to protect a minority, however small, against an overbearing majority; and, although the Government of the day has usually no reason to be particularly pleased with the use that is sometimes made of these rules at three or four o'clock in the morning, yet even that rule, which puts it in the power of any small number of Members to impede, if not to stop business, has the value of protecting a minority against an overbearing majority. Therefore, upon general grounds, I am disposed to object to an innovation of this kind,*and, with the quantity of business we have now to transact, it seems to me it would be unwise to fetter ourselves in the way proposed. It is an inevitable consequence if you have a great deal of business to transact, and only a limited time to transact it in, that you must sit late—

“For the best of all ways to lengthen our days
Is to steal a few hours from the night, my Boys.”

There are many Gentlemen who, if they were not engaged here, would probably be equally out of bed at those hours, and possibly employed in ways not so conducive to the public interest.

MR. HENLEY observed that no one could accuse the noble Lord at the head of the Government of inattention to his duties. It would be well for many, who did not spend a tenth part of the time which he did in the House, to imitate his example in that respect. He (Mr. Henley) did not understand his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire meant to do more than call attention to the subject, as was shown by his moving, on going into Committee on Ways and Means. He thought that all sides of the House would thank his hon. Friend for calling attention to the subject; but he thought it must be left to the discretion of the House to proceed in such a way as to enable them to get through the immense mass of business before them. During the leadership of Sir Robert Peel much progress was made by taking unopposed orders at a late hour, and giving the earlier part of the night to those on which there was a discussion. That plan might perhaps be found useful in the present difficulty. He trusted that his hon. Friend would withdraw his Motion.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was not so presumptuous as to endeavour to regulate the House, and withdrew the Motion.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.—FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, on a recent evening the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) raised very fairly an issue with respect to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in regard to the finances of the country. He said that with the state and prospects of the public expenditure it was not just for them to have dealt, or, as he expressed it, to have tampered with those finances in the month of February. I now refer to that statement of the right hon. Baronet for the purpose of saying that I think there can be no more proper subject of discussion; and, possibly, we may have opportunities of discussing it in passing through their various stages any measures connected with the Vote for the expenditure in China; but with these matters of attack and defence I have no concern to-night. I shall confine myself, and confine myself strictly, as in duty bound, to matters of business and to the provision which Her Majesty's Government propose to the House to make in order to meet the expenditure that has been voted in Supply. The Committee will have perceived that there stand in the paper two notices in my name: one of them is a notice to move Resolutions which are not printed; the other is a notice to move Resolutions which are and have been printed for a length of time. The former relates exclusively to the means of providing for the recent Vote with respect to China; the latter, on the contrary, constitutes that portion to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire has just alluded—that which has not yet been sanctioned by the House, of the financial measures of the month of February. The latter I dismiss entirely for the present, and I confine myself in my present remarks to an explanation of the former.

Mr. Henley

And first, Sir, I wish to lay clearly before the Committee the exact state of the case with respect to the charge, so far as we are able to state it, that has now been incurred in regard to China; because on a former evening (for which I have myself either wholly or in some degree to blame), I do not think it was quite clearly apprehended, and the Government are very desirous that no misapprehension should exist. In the month of February we made provision for the China war as follows:—For a sum of £850,000, to be charged upon the finances of the year—that is, the expiring financial year 1859-60—and for a sum of about double that amount, £1,700,000, to be charged on the Ways and Means of the financial year about to commence—the year 1860-61. These sums together—for the sake of clearness I shall speak in round numbers amounted to £2,550,000:—and that was the whole provision which we proposed to the House to make on account of the expedition to China while it was still an expedition only, and before we had any knowledge that it would necessarily have to conduct warlike operations. The sum that is further now proposed on account of the warlike operations of the same expedition is of nearly the same but of a somewhat greater amount—that is, a sum of £2,850,000. The Vote that is on the table is, indeed, larger than this; but it includes two items that are not comprehended in the figures I have just stated. It includes a sum of £500,000, for which provision was made in the financial arrangements of February, though the Vote in Supply was only taken last week; and it includes also a sum of £450,000 on account of the previous war in China—that may be called the war of 1857—a charge of which we had no knowledge that it would accrue in February, and for which no financial provision had hitherto been made. Therefore, Sir, the whole charge of this expedition to China arising from the occurrences at the mouth of the Peiho down to the present period, as far as Her Majesty's Government can state or can conjecture it, is £5,400,000, to which has to be added the sum of £450,000 due for the former war. And perhaps it may be a matter of interest to the Committee that I should state, in passing, the expense of a former war with China, in order that we may understand, along with other matters applicable to the subject, the tendency to a great increase of charge which is attendant on the course of our present operations. The war of 1840 must, I think, have lasted for between two and three years. I believe Sir Henry Pottinger's treaty was a treaty of 1842; so that that war extended over about two years and a half. The whole expense chargeable for it to this country was no more than £3,200,000. Thus, the total expense chargeable to the country for that war, carried on for the length of time I have named, was no more than £700,000 in excess of the sum which Her Majesty's Government invited this House to provide for the present expedition even when the occurrence of a war was a matter entirely problematical. The whole expense of that war was somewhat more, because a portion of the charge was borne by the East India Company; but the entire expense was only £4,200,000—a sum less by £1,200,000 than that which the House will have to provide—I may say has provided, or at least consented to charge in the present Session, on account of the war now commenced in China. This is the state of the case as regards the amount of charge—namely, £5,400,000 on account of the present expedition, and £450,000 on account of the war of 1857; making together £5,850,000. I have no means of stating to the Committee what has been the total charge of the war of 1857, because, although there were certain Votes not amounting to a very large sum taken specially for that war as Votes of Credit, yet the main portions of the expense were probably borne upon the Estimates under the ordinary heads of charge, and I have no means of separating them from what was due to the general service of the country. With respect to the mode of provision that has been adopted by the Government and proposed to the House, in regard to the portion of charge which was made known to the House, and was within the knowledge of the Government in the month of February, it is as follows:—£850,000, as I have stated, was charged upon the finances of 1859-60. Happily, the provision made by the House in July last for the expenditure of that year was so liberal that the whole of that £850,000 has been paid from the produce of taxes, and not out of temporary resources. It pleased the House towards the close of the late Session to supply us with temporary means, in addition to the taxes which were then voted, by taking up one of the terms of the malt credit. The proceeds of that operation were somewhere between £800,000 and £1,000,000. But the revenue of the year was so productive that even if that malt credit had not been granted we should have been able to pay the additional charge required in the autumn on account of China, and still have had a surplus. As it was, notwithstanding the considerable addition which was made at so late a date to the charge of the year, by taking £850,000 for the Vote of Credit, the surplus of income over expenditure on the 31st of March amounted to no less £1,587,000. Therefore, Sir, it may be justly said, as respects that sum of £850,000, that full provision was made for it out of the taxes of the country. The temporary resource upon which we were enabled to draw by calling up the malt credit, together with the £250,000 which came in as a casual and unexpected payment from Spain, and was applicable to the charges of last year, both contributed to swell that surplus of £1,600,000, and were, therefore, in fact, made applicable to the reduction of the debt of the country. With respect, Sir, to the £1,700,000 which Her Majesty's Government proposed to charge upon the finances of the present year in February last, the case stood differently. I cannot say that we proposed to provide for more than about £500,000 of that sum out of the taxes of the country. For if, on the one hand, we deduct that charge from the anticipated expenditure as it then stood, and if, on the other, we deduct from the anticipated revenue the proceeds of the malt and hop credits and the further payment from the Spanish Government, the case stands thus:—That ties. It would be well for many, who did not spend a tenth part of the time which he did in the House, to imitate his example in that respect. He (Mr. Henley) did not understand his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire meant to do more than call attention to the subject, as was shown by his moving, on going into Committee on Ways and Means. He thought that all sides of the House would thank his hon. Friend for calling attention to the subject; but he thought it must be left to the discretion of the House to proceed in such a way as to enable them to get through the immense mass of business before them. During the leadership of Sir Robert Peel much progress was made by taking unopposed orders at a late hour, and giving the earlier part of the night to those on which there was a discussion. That plan might perhaps be found useful in the present difficulty. He trusted that his hon. Friend would withdraw his Motion.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was not so presumptuous as to endeavour to regulate the House, and withdrew the Motion.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.—FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, on a recent evening the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) raised very fairly an issue with respect to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in regard to the finances of the country. He said that with the state and prospects of the public expenditure it was not just for them to have dealt, or, as he expressed it, to have tampered with those finances in the month of February. I now refer to that statement of the right hon. Baronet for the purpose of saying that I think there can be no more proper subject of discussion; and, possibly, we may have opportunities of discussing it in passing through their various stages any measures connected with the Vote for the expenditure in China; but with these matters of attack and defence I have no concern to-night. I shall confine myself, and confine myself strictly, as in duty bound, to matters of business and to the provision which Her Majesty's Government propose to the House to make in order to meet the expenditure that has been voted in Supply. The Committee will have perceived that there stand in the paper two notices in my name: one of them is a notice to move Resolutions which are not printed; the other is a notice to move Resolutions which are and have been printed for a length of time. The former relates exclusively to the means of providing for the recent Vote with respect to China; the latter, on the contrary, constitutes that portion to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire has just alluded—that which has not yet been sanctioned by the House, of the financial measures of the month of February. The latter I dismiss entirely for the present, and I confine myself in my present remarks to an explanation of the former.

Mr. Henley

And first, Sir, I wish to lay clearly before the Committee the exact state of the case with respect to the charge, so far as we are able to state it, that has now been incurred in regard to China; because on a former evening (for which I have myself either wholly or in some degree to blame), I do not think it was quite clearly apprehended, and the Government are very desirous that no misapprehension should exist. In the month of February we made provision for the China war as follows:—For a sum of £850,000, to be charged upon the finances of the year—that is, the expiring financial year 1859-60—and for a sum of about double that amount, £1,700,000, to be charged on the Ways and Means of the financial year about to commence—the year 1860-61. These sums together—for the sake of clearness I shall speak in round numbers amounted to £2,550,000:—and that was the whole provision which we proposed to the House to make on account of the expedition to China while it was still an expedition only, and before we had any knowledge that it would necessarily have to conduct warlike operations. The sum that is further now proposed on account of the warlike operations of the same expedition is of nearly the same but of a somewhat greater amount—that is, a sum of £2,850,000. The Vote that is on the table is, indeed, larger than this; but it includes two items that are not comprehended in the figures I have just stated. It includes a sum of £500,000, for which provision was made in the financial arrangements of February, though the Vote in Supply was only taken last week; and it includes also a sum of £450,000 on account of the previous war in China—that may be called the war of 1857—a charge of which we had no knowledge that it would accrue in February, and for which no financial provision had hitherto been made. Therefore, Sir, the whole charge of this expedition to China arising from the occurrences at the mouth of the Peiho down to the present period, as far as Her Majesty's Government can state or can conjecture it, is £5,400,000, to which has to be added the sum of £450,000 due for the former war. And perhaps it may be a matter of interest to the Committee that I should state, in passing, the expense of a former war with China, in order that we may understand, along with other matters applicable to the subject, the tendency to a great increase of charge which is attendant on the course of our present operations. The war of 1840 must, I think, have lasted for between two and three years. I believe Sir Henry Pottinger's treaty was a treaty of 1842; so that that war extended over about two years and a half. The whole expense chargeable for it to this country was no more than £3,200,000. Thus, the total expense chargeable to the country for that war, carried on for the length of time I have named, was no more than £700,000 in excess of the sum which Her Majesty's Government invited this House to provide for the present expedition even when the occurrence of a war was a matter entirely problematical. The whole expense of that war was somewhat more, because a portion of the charge was borne by the East India Company; but the entire expense was only £4,200,000—a sum less by £1,200,000 than that which the House will have to provide—I may say has provided, or at least consented to charge in the present Session, on account of the war now commenced in China. This is the state of the case as regards the amount of charge—namely, £5,400,000 on account of the present expedition, and £450,000 on account of the war of 1857; making together £5,850,000. I have no means of stating to the Committee what has been the total charge of the war of 1857, because, although there were certain Votes not amounting to a very large sum taken specially for that war as Votes of Credit, yet the main portions of the expense were probably borne upon the Estimates under the ordinary heads of charge, and I have no means of separating them from what was due to the general service of the country. With respect to the mode of provision that has been adopted by the Government and proposed to the House, in regard to the portion of charge which was made known to the House, and was within the knowledge of the Government in the month of February, it is as follows:—£850,000, as I have stated, was charged upon the finances of 1859-60. Happily, the provision made by the House in July last for the expenditure of that year was so liberal that the whole of that £850,000 has been paid from the produce of taxes, and not out of temporary resources. It pleased the House towards the close of the late Session to supply us with temporary means, in addition to the taxes which were then voted, by taking up one of the terms of the malt credit. The proceeds of that operation were somewhere between £800,000 and £1,000,000. But the revenue of the year was so productive that even if that malt credit had not been granted we should have been able to pay the additional charge required in the autumn on account of China, and still have had a surplus. As it was, notwithstanding the considerable addition which was made at so late a date to the charge of the year, by taking £850,000 for the Vote of Credit, the surplus of income over expenditure on the 31st of March amounted to no less £1,587,000. Therefore, Sir, it may be justly said, as respects that sum of £850,000, that full provision was made for it out of the taxes of the country. The temporary resource upon which we were enabled to draw by calling up the malt credit, together with the £250,000 which came in as a casual and unexpected payment from Spain, and was applicable to the charges of last year, both contributed to swell that surplus of £1,600,000, and were, therefore, in fact, made applicable to the reduction of the debt of the country. With respect, Sir, to the £1,700,000 which Her Majesty's Government proposed to charge upon the finances of the present year in February last, the case stood differently. I cannot say that we proposed to provide for more than about £500,000 of that sum out of the taxes of the country. For if, on the one hand, we deduct that charge from the anticipated expenditure as it then stood, and if, on the other, we deduct from the anticipated revenue the proceeds of the malt and hop credits and the further payment from the Spanish Government, the case stands thus:—That on the 18th of July. Between the 1st and the 16th of July there was an excess of deliveries from bond, as compared with the corresponding period of the previous year, which yielded an augmentation of revenue to an extent of not less than £287,000. A still more pregnant illustration is afforded by the experience of the present year, because it shows that the fact of last year having passed away without an increase of duty by no means convinced the trade that Parliament and the Government had abandoned the idea; on the contrary, they reasoned thus—that, as an increase had not taken place in 1859, it would certainly be made in 1860. And what happened was this. The financial statement was made on the 10th of February, and in the term of three weeks, ending on the same day, there was an augmentation of delivery of spirits from bond which yielded an increase of revenue, as compared with the corresponding period of the previous year, to the extent of £554,000. These circumstances taken together appear to us to constitute a solid foundation for the measure we propose. At the same time, when I have stated that we estimate that that measure will yield something over a million in what remains of the financial year, I must remind the Committee that there are some peculiar causes of uncertainty by which it is affected—causes, I mean, special to the article, and not connected either with the topics to which I have alluded, or with the general condition of the country. The special circumstances are these:—First of all, it is only in the present year that foreign spirits have been admitted to a real competition with British spirits, and at so early a date after that change has taken place we cannot say that the two kinds of spirits have yet found their equilibrium in the market, nor tell precisely what will be the course of competition between them, which would affect the relative yield of duty from the Customs and Excise. There is, again, the competition of wine. There is not the smallest doubt that the competition of wine with spirits will stand upon a different footing from what it has hitherto done. Lastly, the competition of an article in which many Gentlemen in this House—particularly those sitting on the opposite benches, feel a lively and almost tender interest—I mean the competition of malt liquor. Whenever there is a considerable increase in the duty on spirits, it serves to a certain degree to stimulate the process of malting, and in Scotland, and more particularly in Ireland,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

there takes place a considerable augmentation in the consumption of beer, which is traceable, apparently, to no other cause than its greater cheapness as compared with spirits. In recent years, owing to the alterations which Parliament has introduced into the law, there are special causes which produce some peculiar uncertainty into the estimate of the productiveness of the duty; but the uncertainty is on the face of the case, rather than in the substance; because, if an increase of the spirit stimulates the consumption of another duty-paying liquor, you get on the one side of the account what you have lost on the other. I may mention, in passing, that in case the Committee should think fit to adopt the proposal of the Government, it will be necessary to introduce a small modification into the duties on wine as fixed to take effect on the 1st of January next, in order to guard against the danger of a fraudulent introduction of spirits in the form of wine; but that is a subject to which I will call attention at a future stage. I will now state to the Committee the computed produce of this duty, and it is important that the Committee should know it, because the weight of this subject is not to be estimated simply by what is added to our financial resources in the present financial year, but by the effect of the proposition in enlarging a most important branch of revenue in a permanent form available from year to year. The increase of 1s. 11d. duty on British spirits, chargeable on the whole annual consumption, taken at a fair and moderate estimate, would produce—making no allowance for diminution of consumption, dilution, adulteration, or increase of price—would produce no less than £2,252,000 a year, and that without taking into view the proceeds of the increased duty on foreign and colonial spirits. But prudence necessarily requires us to make allowance for some diminution in the total consumption of spirits, in consequence of the additional duty, which might have the effect of adding something like 20 per cent, or nearly 20 per cent, to the price. Instead, therefore, of assuming the augmentation of duty to be £2,250,000, I shall only assume the augmentation of revenue to be £1,000,000 from the increase of Excise duties on British spirits, and that sum of £1,000,000 would be—allowing for a diminution in the quantity consumed of about 10 or 11 per cent—the annual yield of this increased duty of 1s. 11d. per gallon, if we had the whole financial year to deal with. But I am now addressing the Committee on the 16th of July, and about six weeks more must be added to that, because it is the practice of the Department to charge the duty in one of its six-weekly rounds and to raise it in the next. Looking, therefore, to what may come into the Exchequer before the 1st of next April in consequence of this measure of increased duty on British spirits, and assuming that for the whole of one year the increased duty would yield £1,000,000, I can only take credit for about £650,000. To this amount I am about to make an important addition by a countervailing or compensating increase from the duty on foreign and colonial spirits. That, of course, as all Customs duties are taken at ready money, would be reckoned from the time I now speak—from the deliveries of to-morrow:—and the proceeds of the increased duty, making a reasonable allowance for a diminution in consumption, would be about £400,000; making together, with the increase from British spirits, the sum of £1,050,000. That is the provision which the Government mean to make from taxation during the remainder of the present year towards meeting the charge in which we are involved by the war with China. And they make a proposal which is permanent in its nature, though the charge is temporary, because they consider this a measure which is in itself sound and salutary, which Parliament has been expected to adopt, which Parliament may very reasonably desire to adopt, and with respect to which, for some years past, the only question has been as to the precise moment when its adoption might be consistent with prudence.

Sir, I have now got rid of the formidable Vote of £3,800,000 excepting so much of the sum of £2,336,000 as is not provided for by the increase of the spirit duties; and the increased spirit duties £1,050,000 being deducted from £2,336,000, leaves a sum of £1,286,000. This sum we propose to provide for without any further resort to the taxation of the year. The balances in the Exchequer are in a state so satisfactory that probably they might well admit the withdrawal of that, and even if necessary, of a somewhat greater sum. The surplus revenue wisely provided by the House in the arrangements of last year is, of course, available under the provisions of the law, in addition to the balances of the present, and the proper course obviously is to apply in aid those balances when the taxation of the year is insufficient, rather than to go through the operose and needless double process, first, of applying a sum of money to the extinction of debt, and then of going to the market for the contraction of new debt. I will lay shortly before the Committee the state of the balances. On the 1st of April the balances in the Exchequer—which the Committee should be aware by no means represents the whole amount of public deposits in the Bank, but only those for the Consolidated Fund and Supply—was £7,972,000. On the 30th of June the balance was reduced to £6,594,000; but that sum does not represent the real reduction, owing to the fact that the collection of the income tax is by no means equable in the four quarters of the financial year. It comes in lightly in the first and third quarters, and heavily in the second and fourth quarters; and, as we are now coming to one of the heavy quarters, I anticipate that the balance in the Exchequer on the 30th of September will, perhaps, be materially better than on the 30th of June. Looking to the demands of the public service, I feel no hesitation in saying, though of course there will be a drain from China in order to supply the Treasury chest there, that I think it quite unnecessary to take any Supply measure to meet this expenditure, inasmuch as the means actually at the command of the Government (the proceeds of last year's revenue), will enable them to defray it without difficulty. I say that if it be necessary to make the demand on the balances we could draw therefrom without inconvenience the remaining £1,286,000, and indeed the demand on the balances could be extended, if necessary, from £1,300,000 to about £2,000,000. It may be necessary for Government to make application for power to re-borrow £1,000,000 now outstanding on Exchequer bonds which would fall due in November next; but no embarrassment or inconvenience would be attended on that transaction. It is quite possible, if circumstances should be favourable, that it may not be necessary to re-borrow the whole of that sum; and, if necessary, there would be no difficulty whatever in conducting the operation, because these Exchequer bonds are in the hands of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and form for them a convenient and profitable investment, and with them they can remain.

This is the statement I have to lay before the Committee; and if there are any particulars in which I have failed to convey clearly my meaning it will give me great satisfaction to answer any question that may be proposed to me. I have still, however, to state two points. The first is that it will be my duty, as on all occasions when an increase of Excise duty is proposed, to ask the Committee for an immediate Vote. The purpose of that is, of course, well understood. It is not in any degree with the view of binding the discretion of the Committee, but to secure the charge of the duty on the commodity, so that no loss to the revenue may take place pending the time when the House is considering whether or not it would be right finally to adopt the proposal. The rule, that the augmentation of Customs' duties should be immediate on the proposal, is not in itself so entirely urgent and imperative as the rule with respect to Excise duties; but in the present case it is quite plain that what we do with respect to the Excise must be done with respect to the Customs; for if we impose an Excise duty of 10s. on spirits, and do not impose the Customs' duty till next week or so on the competing article, there would be immense deliveries of foreign and colonial spirits, to the great injury of the revenue and of the home trade. That is what I have to state with regard to the proposals which I have submitted to-night. The further Resolutions have been long under the consideration of the Committee, and stand in a category altogether different. But in regard to the present proposal, I ask, in accordance with uniform practice, for an immediate Vote, without in the least degree binding the discretion of the House. Of course the Government will appoint such a day as may meet the convenience of hon. Members for taking the discussion on what I may call the merits of the measure, and that will accordingly be made a matter of arrangement. But as there is another subject involving a charge upon the country which has not been brought before Parliament it is right I should allude to it for a moment. It is that of the Vote for fortifications, which remains up to the present time without explanation, and with regard to which, of course, the Committee will be desirous of knowing the intentions of the Government. What I have to say upon the subject is that though it could not be conveniently combined with the very heterogeneous matter with which I have now been dealing, it is the intention of my noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) to explain the mode in which the Government propose to apply the sum of money which has been reserved for the Vote of fortifications, and likewise to explain their views respecting the Report of the Commissioners recently laid before the House. My noble Friend will probably do this upon an evening which he will select antecedently to the day when the House will be asked to give a decisive vote upon the proposals I have now submitted. All I need now say is that, so far as the Government are concerned, if the House will accede to our proposals, it is not our intention to make any further demand in the shape of taxation upon the country for the services of the present year. Thanking the House for the attention with which it has heard my statement, I will now conclude by moving the First Resolution.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Resolution moved—

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged for and upon every gallon of Spirits of the strength of Hydrometer proof which, on or after the fifteenth day of July 1860, shall be distilled in the United Kingdom, or be in the stock, custody, or possession of any distiller in the United Kingdom, or of any person in trust for him, or for his use, benefit, or account, or which having been distilled in the United Kingdom shall, on or after the said day be in any Duty-free warehouse, or on removal to any such warehouse, and be taken for consumption in the United Kingdom, the Duty of One Shilling and Eleven Pence, and so in proportion for any greater or less quantity, or any greater or less degree of strength, in addition to the Duty chargeable on such Spirits under any Act or Acts in force, or under any Resolution of this House, passed during the present Session of Parliament."

MR. VANCE said, that he fully agreed that there ought to be no limit to the taxation on ardent spirits until it reached an amount that would defeat its own object; but he thought the increase now proposed would enormously stimulate the illicit distillation of spirit—in Ireland at least—and that the consumption of duty-paid spirit would, consequently, fall very short of what the Chancellor of the Exchequer anticipated. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had seemed to draw an argument in favour of his proposed increase from the fact that the trade had anticipated his intended increase. It was only natural that the trade should entertain such anticipations, because the right hon. Gentleman had never before, as he had on the present occasion, announced that he had arrived at a final limit. But it was scarcely any inconvenience to the trade to anticipate by a month or two the delivery of spirit from bond; and he did not therefore, think, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was using a fair argument when he said that because the trade had looked forward to what might happen, that therefore what did happen was right and reasonable. He was, however, particularly desirous on the present occasion of impressing upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this was a favourable opportunity of doing justice to the home trade. When home-made spirits were placed in bond the duty was eventually, upon their being taken out again, levied upon the number of gallons which the cask originally contained when it entered the Queen's stores; but when foreign spirits were taken out of bond the duty was charged only upon the actual number of gallons the cask contained. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give his attention to this, and consider whether it was not possible to place the home and the foreign trade on the same level. Beyond this, also, another grievance relating to the home trade was that the allowance for leakage and evaporation while in store was much smaller than it actually amounted to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the point to which the hon. Gentleman had called the attention of the Committee was one the importance of which the Government fully acknowledged, and that they had under consideration at that moment various points connected with the more equitable adjustment of the rules of Excise in favour of the distillers. The present state of things was a natural consequence of their being subjected for the first time to a real foreign competition.

MR. CRAWFORD asked what were the contemplated changes in the wine duties as recently settled by the House, to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded as consequent upon the proposed alterations in the spirit duties?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in the event of the House adopting the 10s. spirit duty, there would be no change in the wine duty at the present moment. The 3s. duty now leviable would remain so to the first of January next without any change, because that was a duty that gave rise to no serious apprehension with regard to its affecting the amount derivable from spirits. But he thought it probable he would have to make the following propositions:—That in the 1s. duty on wine of less than 18 per cent proof strength there should be no change; that to the 1s. 6d. duty on wine above 18 per cent and under 25 per cent strength an addition of 2d. or 3d. per gallon should be made; and that to the 2s. duty on wine between 25 and 40 per cent strength an addition of either 4d. or 5d. per gallon should be made.

MR. M. SMITH said, he could scarcely comprehend what the Chancellor of the Exchequer meant by describing the Exchequer as being in so flourishing a state, when there were deficiency bills to meet to the amount of £1,500,000.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that nominally such an amount of deficiency bills were in existence, but as far as he was able to form a judgment at the present moment, he believed that no interest would be payable on such bills during the present quarter.

MR. W. WILLIAMS inquired whether any change would be made in the relative position of colonial and foreign spirits?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that foreign and colonial spirit would stand on precisely the same footing relatively as at present—the duty on colonial spirit would be 10s. 2d. a gallon, and that on foreign spirit 10s. 5d. per gallon.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE inquired whether the wine drawback had been paid out of the expenditure for the year ending March last or out of that for the present year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that in estimating, on the 10th of February last, the probable charge on the country for what remained of the financial year, he took £350,000 on account of wine drawback. That sum was provided for out of the revenue of last year, and formed no charge on the revenue of the present year. That sum was not, however, actually obtained out of the revenue of last year before the expiration of the year, because the Government had not obtained Parliamentary authority to pay the drawback. Almost all the payments had now been made, and the result was that the whole charge on the public in respect of drawback, as the cost of effecting this great operation of the reduction of the duties, would be under £200,000, instead of £350,000, as he had expected.

LORD FERMOY said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had very quietly availed himself of the amount thrown back upon his hands by the refusal of the other House of Parliament to agree to the Repeal of the paper duties. But he (Lord Fermoy) did not think the right hon. Gentleman in doing this was acting fairly to those who, like himself, did not consider the question settled. The right hon. Gentleman too was the last man in the world who ought to endeavour or appear to dispose of this question by a side wind. By availing himself of the law as it stood the right hon. Gentleman placed them in this position—that whereas if the House were disposed to send the Bill back to the Lords there was now this difficulty interposed, that the right hon. Gentleman had admitted that as financiers the Lords had proved themselves more capable than he. The right hon. Gentleman might have left the amount, which he said was about £700,000, as a surplus. It would have been better if the right hon. Gentleman had refrained from taking any active step upon the law as it at present stood. He protested against this mode of getting rid of a difficult question by a side wind. He, and those who thought with him, were prepared to face all the difficulties of the question, and he was sorry to see the right hon. Gentleman disposed to act differently.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in making this statement to the Committee he had endeavoured, as far as it was possible to do so, to avoid prejudicing any question or any proposition that the noble Lord or any one else might submit to the House. As a Member of the House of Commons, he was ready, when the question at issue with the House of Lords came to be debated, to enter into it and to assert his opinion without disguise. But he did not consider it to be his duty on every incidental occasion that might occur to refer to his individual opinion on that point. He had cautiously avoided giving offence, or taking too much responsibility on his own shoulders, for he had said that the money should be available in case the House should so please.

MR. BALL regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having got £700,000 by the paper duty, had not set that amount against the malt duty credits, and thus conferred a great boon upon the agriculturists.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed that the malt growers would be rather benefited than injured by an increase of the spirit duties.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH contended that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, notwithstanding the answer just given to the noble Lord, had, by the statement he had made that evening, precluded himself from taking that "action" which was spoken of with so much boasting the other night with reference to the rejection of the Paper Duty Repeal Bill.

Lord Fermoy

Resolution agreed to.

Also Resolutions 2 and 3, fixing the duties on spirits imported from Foreign countries, and from the Channel Islands.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the Fourth Resolution:—

Resolution moved—

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the 12th Section of the Act passed in the sixth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, chap. 81, which enacts that it shall not be necessary for any person or persons to take out an Excise Licence for the sale of any foreign goods or commodities, for the sale of which in any manner an Excise Licence is required; while such goods or commodities shall be and remain in the warehouse or warehouses in which the same shall have been deposited, lodged, or secured according to Law, before payment of Duty upon the importation thereof, shall not extend to exempt any person from liability to take out an Excise Licence for the sale of any Foreign Wine or Spirits."

MR. HANKEY said, the effect of this Resolution would be to compel importing merchants—merely because they had imported some few casks of spirits in the course of the year, passing their goods through the Custom House, and having nothing to do with the Excise—to take out an Excise licence. That certainly never was understood. It was extremely difficult to follow up these Resolutions. They had been on the paper sometimes in one shape, sometimes in another; and he knew not where they were in regard to them. He was quite sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not intend to take any of the trade by surprise; but, having referred to the Act, he did not think it would bear this interpretation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was very sorry his hon. Friend appeared to object so much to the Resolution. It was within his (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) own knowledge, that it was known and understood by those who had thought fit to give it their attention. The way in which the case now stood was this: Up to the present time there had been but a very slight competition between the ordinary established wine and spirit merchants of England, and a class of persons who went about the country as agents for various houses, and dealers in wines and spirits, which were in bond; or as canvassers for British houses, perhaps, but always with respect to the article when it was in bond. Now, at a time when they were going to have a very sharp competition in all probability in that trade, and when there were so many new channels of supply to be opened, it was absolutely necessary to remove that anomaly, and to require that everybody who dealt in wines and spirits in bonds should be liable to pay the same tax for Excise licences, as those who dealt in wines and spirits free. Then he came to the main question—what were they to do with the West India importers of rum? He frankly owned that he had not been able to discover any satisfactory mode of exempting them from duty. They were dealers in spirits in bond; they could not get rid of that definition; but if they really thought it worth contending for, and if they had any good mode of drawing the distinction, he did not know that the House might not be willing to consider it. He could not say that he thought they had a very strong claim, or that theirs appeared to be a very heavy burthen. He begged to remind his hon. Friend, that they had got a penny more protection on their rum than they were entitled to. ["Hear!"] He could assure his hon. Friend that, owing to the way in which one arrangement came across another, it was perfectly clear that that was the fact; indeed, he was not quite certain that they had not got 3*d*. At all events, he could assure his hon. Friend that they got more protection on their rum than they were entitled to. It was the best and fairest arrangement which could be made upon the whole; and if it were looked into, it would be found that their position, on the whole, was quite as good, or, perhaps, a shade better than before. The Resolution had been some months in its present shape; and he trusted that, on the 16th of July, he should not be asked to postpone it.

MR. CAVE said, the West Indian importers did not allow that any great advantage was possessed by them over the distiller, for they had a very long voyage, and they lost a quantity of the spirits by leakage during it. There were a great many other disadvantages, too, which practically made the position of the West Indian importers very much worse than that of the distillers, who had everything under their eyes, and had not to carry their products any distance to the market. With regard to the immediate question, there was a considerable difference between an importing merchant and an agent taking orders for a foreign or British house. Although not considerable in amount, there was something entirely unprecedented in the present proposal, and he felt sure it could not be difficult to find words to exempt the importers.

MR. CRAWFORD said, as an occasional importer of spirits in bond, he should be very glad if he felt himself at liberty to claim exemption from the charge. But there were good reasons for some charge being imposed upon a class of gentlemen who represented establishments abroad, especially on the Continent. It was very evident that, if they felt it worth while to obtain orders for their wines and spirits in bond by personal solicitations, they must have an advantage in doing so, which was in competition with the regular wine merchants who paid the licence.

MR. AYRTON said, there seemed to be three or four classes of persons involved in the exemption, whose conditions were very different. First, the merchants engaged in the importation of foreign spirits; then the second class, those who did not import, but sold for consumption in this country; and then the third class, who dealt in commodities in bond; and he understood that the right hon. Gentleman wished to put the tax on the latter class, who came immediately into competition with the ordinary wine merchants. To that there could be no objection; but he trusted the proposed change would not be carried the length which was implied in the clause. The result would be that almost every general merchant of England would have to take out a licence, because in the course of the year he might have some transaction, for a constituent perhaps, to the extent of a parcel of wine. He hoped the Resolution would be confined to its legitimate object. The agents of whom the right hon. Gentleman spoke might not, under the Resolution, be taxed at all, because it was the principal who must take out the licence.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The agents will not be allowed to act, unless he acts for a principal who pays the Licence.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution moved.

"5. That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the time limited for payment of the Duty of Excise on Malt by every maltster or maker of Malt who shall have given security in the manner directed by the Act passed in that behalf, in respect of all Malt begun to be made on after the first day of October, 1860, shall be six weeks in lieu of twelve weeks after the making of such account or return of Duty as in the said Act is mentioned."

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution moved.

"6. That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duty of Excise, which for the time being is or shall be chargeable on Hops growing or to grow in Great Britain, shall be payable on the first day of March, 1861, and afterwards on the first day of January next after the curing thereof."

LORD HARRY VANE said, although the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson) who had given notice of an Amendment for the repeal of the hop duty was now absent, he wished to say a few words on the subject. He was glad the Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed a reduction of the duty, which, as far as it went, was a step in the right direction. He wished, however, that the right hon. Gentleman had felt himself justified in moving the total repeal of this tax, which operated most unfairly and oppressively on the hop-growers. It was only consistent with a free trade policy that this objectionable impost should be abolished, and he therefore trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would include its abolition in some future scheme of finance.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, however dull of comprehension a Chancellor of the Exchequer might be, he was certain somehow or other to learn before he had been long in office the sentiments and the case of the hop-growers; and he had himself had full opportunity of appreciating their statements in that respect. He was glad to be able to propose a small reduction, and should have been glad had it been in his power to propose a greater.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, the hop-growers of this country had now come to view the prospect of free trade in hops without fear or horror, believing that they could compete with all the world. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would before long concede the total abolition of this Excise duty.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution moved.

"7. That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged and paid upon Chicory, or any other vegetable matter applicable to the uses of Chicory or Coffee, grown in the United Kingdom, for every hundredweight thereof, raw or kiln-dried, until the first day of April 1861, the Duty of Three Shillings; and on and after that day the Duty of Six Shillings, and so in proportion for any greater or less quantity than a hundredweight."

Resolution agreed to.

Also Resolutions 8 and 9, fixing the Duties upon Contract Notes and Assignments or Leases.

Resolution moved.

"10. That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, in lieu of the Stamp Duty now chargeable upon the instruments hereinafter mentioned, there shall be charged and paid the Stamp Duties following:—namely,

For and upon any Policy of Assurance or Insurance, by whatever name the same shall be called, whereby any sum of money shall be assured or agreed to be paid only upon the death of any person from, or by reason of, any cause incident to or consequent upon travelling, whether by land or water, or any accident or external violence, or any cause whatever other than a natural cause; or whereby any compensation shall be assured, or agreed to be made or paid, for personal injury received from any cause whatever; or whereby both a sum of money upon death and a compensation for personal injury as aforesaid shall be assured and agreed to be paid:—

Where the premium or consideration for such Assurance or Agreement shall not exceed two shillings and sixpence	s. d.	0 1
And where the same shall exceed two shillings and sixpence and shall not exceed ten shillings		0 6
And where the same shall exceed ten shillings and shall not exceed one pound		1 0
And where the same shall exceed one pound, then for every twenty shillings, and also for every fractional part of twenty shillings		1 0

MR. AYRTON said, that this Resolution imposed a stamp duty of 1d. upon all assurances where the premium did not exceed 2s. 6d. Such a duty would press very unfairly upon a class of assurances applicable to passengers by railways, who took a ticket of assurance for a single journey, for which they paid 2d., 4d., and 6d., according to the class in which they travelled. A charge of 1d. would be a tax of 50 per cent on third-class passengers, which would press very unfairly upon them. He would, accordingly, suggest that the new duty should only be leviable on premiums above 6d., so as to exclude this class of assurances.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the view of the hon. Member not unreasonable. He did not believe that any new duty would be charged under this Resolution upon any instrument not now liable to duty. The Resolution ran "In lieu of the stamp duty now chargeable upon the instruments hereinafter mentioned." In case of doubt, a financial Resolution was always construed in favour of the public. The matter, however, should be looked into, and care taken to exclude these assurances.

Mr. MALINS believed that the clause would have the effect of imposing a duty of 1*d.* upon railway assurances unless it were altered.

Mr. AYRTON trusted that benefit societies would be exempt, in accordance with the assurances of the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the early part of the Session.

Resolution moved.

"11. That it is expedient to amend the Acts relating to Stamp Duties."

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution moved.

"That towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged and paid for and upon any Promissory Note made, or purporting to be made, out of the United Kingdom, for the payment within the United Kingdom of any sum of money, the same Stamp Duty as on an Inland Bill of Exchange for the payment, otherwise than on demand, of money of the same amount."

Resolution agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished to explain the course which he proposed to take on the Report—and which he believed would not be opposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite—with reference to the Resolutions upon the spirit duties voted to-night without notice. A Bill regulating the sale of spirits, and containing, in fact, the whole of the law upon that subject, now stood for a third reading. This Bill would be reported to-morrow, and he should propose to recommit that Bill for the purpose of inserting these Resolutions in the Bill. The Resolutions would then stand in the Bill as a portion of its provisions, the Bill would be reported as amended, and would then stand for a third reading. The debate on the Resolutions might either be taken on the report of the Bill as amended, or on the recommitment of the Bill, and a day might be named for the debate.

Mr. WALPOLE said, that the right hon. Gentleman had proposed to take a most unusual course. He proposed to insert new Resolutions in a Bill which would thus evade a discussion upon the second reading. He was not aware that in any Taxing Bill such a course was ever adopted as to insert Resolutions into a Bill that stood for a third reading, thereby saving the first two stages, and inserting new Resolutions upon the recommitment. He could not help thinking that exception would properly be taken to such a course.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER saw great objection to any course that limited the power of the House to discuss such Resolutions on the recommitment of the Bill.

House resumed; Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 128 agreed to.

Clause 129 (Securities may be purchased).

Mr. CAYLEY said, he thought that this clause gave unreasonable power to the Accountant General in Bankruptcy as regarded the investment of the large sums entrusted to him. This clause, in connection with the 132nd Clause, demanded, he thought, the gravest consideration.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, he wished to correct some misapprehensions which appeared to exist. The hon. Members for Newcastle-under-Lyne and Kendal stated the other evening that there were in the hands of the Bank of England, on an average, gross balances exceeding £100,000, belonging to the Court of Bankruptcy, and that the Bank derived, by the commission charged for the management of those funds, a sum varying from £3,000 to £4,000 per annum. Now, he (Mr. Crawford) had inquired into that matter, and he was enabled to inform the Committee that there was considerable exaggeration in those statements. Looking at the accounts in past years it appeared there had been on one occasion a balance of £161,000 in the Bank. In the course of a week that sum was reduced to £50,000, and in another week a further considerable reduction was effected. Not long afterwards the balance was not more than £420. It was equally untrue to say that the charge made by the Bank of England for the management of those funds was £3,000 or £4,000 a year—for example, the sum charged last year was only £2,203. Out of that sum the Bank had to pay the salaries of officers employed solely in the management of this branch of the Bankruptcy Court; to pay various incidental expenses, and, in fact, to maintain the whole expenses of an establishment for the purpose. Practically speaking the Bank derived next to nothing for itself for the management of this fund.

Mr. MURRAY said, the hon. Member for London (Mr. Crawford) evidently was not aware of the Return of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, and which he now held in his hand. This Return showed that the sums received by the Bank on account of the Court of Bankruptcy in the years 1855, 1856, 1857, 1858, and 1859 exceeded £6,500,000, and the payments to nearly the same sum. The Return further stated that the average of the quarterly balances in those years was £83,700. The highest balance was in September, 1856, £166,247; the lowest in March, 1858, £26,369. In respect of remuneration, the hon. Member stated that the Bank received in 1859, £2,200; but the Accountant made it £3,160. The hon. Member was therefore greatly in error as to the amount of remuneration received for managing the account of the Court of Bankruptcy. The hon. Member for London was therefore not justified in charging himself and the hon. Member for Kendall with inaccuracy. He fully adhered to his former statement.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 130 and 131

Clause 132 (If Securities at any Time insufficient to answer Demands, Deficiency to be made good by Parliament).

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the clause provided that the funds of bankrupt estates paid into the account of the Accountant in Bankruptcy should be invested in 3 per cent consols, and as this was for the security and benefit of the creditors it was only reasonable that they should run the risk of any fall in the value of the stock. The clause, however, gave a guarantee to the creditors that the Government would be responsible for any such loss—a proposition which he thought was highly objectionable.

MR. CAYLEY characterized the proposition to saddle the public with the loss arising from an investment made for the advantage of the creditors as altogether monstrous. He was disposed to take the sense of the Committee upon the clause.

MR. VANCE contended that if the general bankruptcy fund got the benefit of the interest, as he believed it did, the creditors ought in justice to be protected from any fall in the price of the stock. And if the proposition were not agreed to, the creditors should be allowed the interest that might accrue.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the clause was word for word the same as the existing law on the subject, which had been in operation for some years. The real facts were these. The Accountant in Bankruptcy had received from day to day large sums, and consequently had always a large floating balance to his credit. The portion of it which he found it prudent to invest yielded an annual income of about £40,000. That sum of £40,000 was applied for the benefit of the Court of Bankruptcy, and was one of the chief sources of revenue which enabled him to abolish the onerous fees and impositions which were now charged to suitors. He therefore contended that as the profit was taken by the public, and applied to public purposes, the public was bound to guarantee the parties entitled to the money from the possibility of any deficiency. There was no likelihood, however, that the public would be called upon to sustain any loss in consequence of that guarantee.

Mr. Murray

MR. CAYLEY: the objection was not to investments, but to unlimited investments.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: None but the creditors of Estates in bankruptcy were interested in the application of the fund. It was a question in which the public had no interest whatever. He protested against entering into unlimited guarantees for the benefit of creditors in the Court of Bankruptcy.

MR. LONGFIELD said, that the Court of Bankruptcy was a court for the administration of justice in the largest sense of the word, and courts of justice should be maintained at the public expense. Since, therefore, the interest received from these investments went to maintain the court—the public really had the benefit of them, and consequently ought to bear any loss that might arise.

MR. BARROW said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken was mistaken. The Bankruptcy Fund and not the public derived the profits made from the investments.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, the profits never reached the public. The Bankruptcy Fund retained the profits, and the public by this measure would be bound to make good the losses.

MR. MALINS said, that in the Court of Chancery every penny invested there went not for the benefit of the public, but for those on whose behalf it was invested. With respect to the fund of the Court of Bankruptcy, there was a fund invested, of which the public had the benefit, and as it was so large, he did not believe the public would ever be called upon to pay anything towards the administration of the affairs of bankruptcy.

MR. BAGLEY said, that a more rapid distribution of funds would render investments unnecessary.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 85; Noes 20: Majority 65.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill. Clauses 133 and 134 agreed to.

Clause 135 (Released Commissioners' Salaries continued).

MR. PAGET moved as an Amendment to leave out the words "the full," and insert "two-thirds of the" in line 4, and at the end of the clause to add, "provided that in case he shall be called upon to perform any of the duties mentioned in section 4, he shall in such case, and so long as he shall be called upon to perform such duties, receive the full amount of his salary, payable in like manner." The reason why he proposed two-thirds was because he greatly objected to embarrass the fund with such heavy payments. The system was not adopted in the military profession, and he did not see why it should obtain in the legal. The system was objectionable to the country, and he thought that it was sufficient to do simple justice in the matter without conferring what would really be a boon.

Amendment proposed, in page 30, line 4, to leave out the words "the full," in order to insert the words "two thirds of the."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the rule hitherto invariably acted upon was that, if upon public grounds, it was deemed expedient to do away with a public office, they could not do so justly without giving to the officer the full value of his office. He thought it would introduce a dangerous principle, if the House of Commons abrogated any office conferred by contract on individuals for life—or quamdiu se bene gesserint without giving full compensation. The 4th and 5th clauses of the Bill already passed, affirmed the principle that the Commissioners were entitled to their full salaries, and the House would act inconsistently in adopting this Amendment. He trusted the House would not lay down a new rule, which he thought would be disastrous to the real interests of the country.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the principle laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman was quite new. He denied that there was any contract between the public and these gentlemen. It seemed as though lawyers were to be placed under a different rule than other men. He remembered the abolition of the Six Clerks. He proposed on that occasion that the retiring allowance of those Gentlemen should be £700 a year, but they were allowed to take away with them £6,000 or £7,000 a year from the public treasury.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that he thought the hon. and learned Attorney General put the illustration a little too high when he compared these Gentlemen's salaries to private property. But with regard to the justice of the case, the whole of these five Commissioners had been Commissioners twenty-eight years ago, and the country had had the benefit of their services for that period. They were all competent to go on performing their work, and if an Act of Parliament deprived them of their offices it was but just that they should be fully paid. In a public point of view it was desirable not to be too niggard in such a matter, or otherwise officers whose places were to be abolished for the sake of some reform would set their faces against the proposed change, and prove great obstacles in its way.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 77; Noes 43: Majority 34.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 136 (Salaries of Officers of the Court of Bankruptcy).

MR. HENLEY asked for an explanation of the latter portion of the clause, which provided that the annual sums now payable out of the Consolidated Fund for the use and purposes of the Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors and the officers thereof, other than the Commissioners of the said Court, shall be paid in future into the Bank of England, to the credit of the Chief Registrar's account in Bankruptcy.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the Insolvent Court was entitled to an allowance in aid of its funds amounting to above £4,500 annually. It was not proposed to make any alteration whatever in the amount, but to transfer the sum to the credit of the new amalgamated jurisdiction. It was but fair that, as the Court of Bankruptcy was to assume the liabilities of the Insolvent Court, it should likewise obtain whatever advantages were attached to it.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE thought the right hon. Gentleman had been misled by some of the officials of the Court of Bankruptcy. There were no payments from the Consolidated Fund to the officers of the Court other than the Commissioners, but sums were annually voted in Supply to make good the deficiency in the funds of the Insolvent Court. As that Court was no longer to exist, he thought there was something objectionable in voting sums of money at the outset in aid of a fund which might no longer present a deficiency, and which, should it prove deficient, would have to be made good by a Vote in Supply.

SIR FITZROY KELLY suggested the leaving out of the last portion of the clause.

After a short discussion,

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would strike out the latter part of the clause to which objection had been taken, and would bring up a separate clause, providing how much was to be taken out of the Consolidated Fund and how much was to be voted every year.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 137 agreed to.

Clause 138 (Pensions and Retiring Allowances).

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE moved an Amendment, providing that the Lord Chancellor shall not have power to grant retiring allowances in cases of ill-health or permanent infirmity, except after twelve years' service.

SIR FITZROY KELLY thought that the limit of five or seven years was long enough.

MR. EDWIN JAMES suggested a limit of ten years.

MR. PEACOCKE suggested that there should be some smaller amount of compensation where the period of service had been short.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, if the Committee thought it was necessary to insert a limit of time he would consent to insert seven years, though he thought that there might be some hardship arising even from this.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he would consent to the limit of seven years, and withdraw the Amendment he had moved.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 139 to 151 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 152 (Abolition of distinction between Trader and Non-trader).

MR. HENLEY moved an Amendment for the purpose of raising the important question whether this great change, applying the bankrupt laws to non-traders and traders alike, should or should not take place. He would state to the Committee two or three classes of persons who would be injuriously affected by it. It was most unjust by retrospective action to place some persons in a position of advantage and others in a position of amazing disadvantage, which was never contemplated when the parties contracted. A man's father might have died twenty or thirty years ago leaving an estate chargeable with various amounts, and that man, as was commonly the practice, might have raised money by mortgage on the property to pay off his brothers and sisters. It was a debt, because the man covenanted with the mortgagee to repay the money, as well as pledged the land for it; but it was a debt totally different in its nature from liabilities to his butcher or baker, because the creditor had a special security in the land for payment. A panic might arise—panics seemed to have their cycles, and appeared to come round every ten years. There was a panic in 1847, and another in 1857, when money was hardly to be obtained at all, and, if obtained, only at a most extravagant rate of interest. A person in the situation which he had described might be called upon in such times of pressure to pay off his debt. If he did not it was proposed that judgment might be recovered, and he might be made a bankrupt. He might be told that it was the ordinary case of a man against whom a judgment was recovered; but the screw in ordinary cases could not be compared with the screw of threatening to make such a person a bankrupt, to send him to prison, to seize everything belonging to him, even his most private papers, and to drag his wife into a court, which they had just heard was unfit for any one to enter. That was one class of persons, and a numerous one. A vast portion of the land of England was mortgaged under those circumstances, and it did not apply exclusively to men of high rank and station. He believed that the more they descended the scale the more was the land mortgaged, and just in proportion as they descended the scale was the difficulty of raising money in times of pressure increased—especially as the usury laws were repealed. It must not be supposed that it was a question which only affected the higher classes. It affected every man—from the Archbishop of Canterbury to the lowest cottager—and such a change ought not to be made without great and corresponding advantages. He saw no objection to there being one Court instead of two. If a man wanted to petition the Court and to be wound up, let him be made a bankrupt and go to the Bankruptcy Court, but he saw no reason why they should include under the operation of the bankrupt law a class of persons who could not fairly be said to be insolvent debtors. Another class of cases was not unfrequent. A man had a limited estate. He could not raise money by mortgage. He had perhaps improvidently been spending more than his income. He had to incur debts to put his family out in the world, purchasing commissions or educating them for professions. These debts were usually met by borrowing money on annuities. When the eldest son was twenty-four or twenty-five years of age an arrangement was often made by which the entail was broken, money was raised on mortgage, the annuities were discharged, and the family was again placed in easy and comfortable circumstances. How would the Bill affect persons in that condition? It said that any conveyance for that purpose should be valid if the lender had no notice of any act of bankruptcy. These notices, of course, would make lenders of money very careful. It would not be an easy matter sometimes to say whether a lender had received that species of information which the law described as a "notice." The definition of "notice" often gave rise to litigation, and therefore he believed lenders of money would be very shy of dealing with persons under the circumstances he had described, who might be more or less deeply involved, and might, perhaps, have judgments against them. Then, there was a third class of cases, also of not unfrequent occurrence. He meant cases where persons, being in difficulties, assigned their affairs to trustees, very often for the purpose of raising money by mortgage to pay off other incumbrances. Sometimes a father and son joined in putting an estate under trust in that way, and their affairs were thus set right without further trouble. This Bill, however, would interfere with an arrangement of that kind, because it provided that every trust deed which did not fulfil the conditions specified in the arrangement clause should be utterly void. The case he had instanced was not provided for by the Bill, and the consequence would be that these arrangements would be rendered impossible. Men circumstanced as he had described would, therefore, be almost ruined. For these reasons he held that the clause, naked as it stood, ought not to be agreed to. He hoped the Attorney General would either agree to exclude the large class of persons he had specified from the operation of the measure, or, if not, at least to introduce such provisions as would prevent that great inconvenience which the Bill, as it stood, must necessarily cause to that class. He could not see that by the proposed arrangement the smallest advantage would be conferred on any one except the money-lenders, who, he believed, were perfectly capable of taking care of themselves. He understood almost all the hon. and learned Gentlemen in the House were against him on this occasion. ["Hear, hear!"—"No!"] He was glad there was some one to say "no," but he feared that, generally, the lawyers were against him. He believed, however, that mankind at large had little reason to feel satisfied when all the lawyers were on one side. When they were divided they fought the matter out, and so the truth was elicited; but when there was a great preponderance of them on one side, it was high time for laymen to look out. It was very desirable, no doubt, that the law should be made as symmetrical as possible; but he could not forget that there had been great lawyers in the world before the present generation, and that for some 200 years they had drawn a great distinction between trading and other debtors. He was well aware that this distinction had been much broken down in the present century by the introduction of the Insolvency Court system; but he believed there was an essential difference between trading and commercial and non-traders debts, and he thought the distinction ought not to be demolished altogether, as the Bill proposed. In moving the omission of certain words, he did so, not under the pretence that that would be the best way of altering the clauses, but for the sake of raising discussion on the question involved. He then moved the omission of the words "debtors whether" after the word "all."

Mr. E. P. Bouverie

MR. EDWIN JAMES thought the right hon. Gentleman had hardly done justice to the lawyers, for during the debate on this Bill they had taken a most liberal and generous course, a number of them having voted against the enormous compensation proposed to be awarded. This clause involved one of the most important questions connected with the subject of bankruptcy, as affecting not merely the mercantile but the social relations of the country. When the Attorney General introduced the Bill he (Mr. James) stated that he would support the principle it embodied, and he intended to do so. He must admit, however, that if it was to be carried out, it ought to be surrounded with a great many protections. He found that by Clause 164 every judgment creditor who was entitled to sue out against a debtor a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum—which could be got for a debt of £20—or to charge the debtor in execution, was authorized, at the end of one week from the signing of judgment, to sue out against the debtor, whether he be in custody or not, so long as he was in England, a summons, requiring him to appear and be examined respecting his ability to satisfy the debt. Then, again, Clause 170 provided as follows:—

“Upon the Appearance of the Debtor he may be examined on Oath, by or on behalf of the Creditor and by the Court, respecting his Ability to satisfy the Debt, and for the Discovery of Property applicable in that Behalf, and shall be bound to produce, on Oath or otherwise, such Books, Papers, and Documents in his Possession or Power relating to Property applicable or alleged to be applicable to the Satisfaction of the Debt, as the Court shall think fit, and to sign his Examination when reduced into Writing; and any Debtor who shall upon Examination wilfully fail to discover fully and truly to the best of his Knowledge and Belief all his Property, Real and Personal, inclusive of his Rights and Credits, and to produce all Books, Papers, and documents in his possession or Power relating thereto, shall be liable to be committed by the Court as in the Case of a Bankrupt.”

It appeared to him that that was a very dangerous and extraordinary power to confer on a creditor, and he could not help thinking that there ought to be some distinction between a mercantile and, as the phrase was, a gentleman debtor. By the French code no one except the person trading was liable to the Bankrupt Law. But the present clause might be made the means of the greatest extortion. A young man who had contracted a debt of £40 or £50 might get into the hands of usurers, who might make the whole of his property subservient to their extortion. He had given notice of an Amendment, which he should press, to the effect that all Peers, whether Peers of Parliament or otherwise, should be equally liable to the bankrupt laws with Members of the House of Commons.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS believed that this was the first occasion on which a question had been brought before the House of Commons which had excited much discussion out of doors—namely, whether non-traders ought to be liable to the bankrupt laws. He regretted that a discussion of so much importance should come on at so advanced a period of the Session. It was to be remembered that, whatever the views of hon. Members might be as to the abolition of the distinction between traders and non-traders, such a change was not demanded by commercial circles. The question that interested them was, whether they should have those Amendments in the administration and execution of the bankrupt laws which they had demanded. The other question was not one of urgency, and was not demanded by the feeling of the country, and might have been postponed to another time. It ought not at all events to be legislated upon without a full and searching investigation. Having had occasion to consider the subject, he would frankly state his belief that, to a certain extent, an irresistible argument might be urged in favour of abolishing the present distinction between the trader and non-trader. When, however, he saw the sweeping manner in which the change was proposed to be made he felt the greatest alarm. If the clause were adopted, all non-traders would be brought under the peril of committing one of the acts of bankruptcy therein described. Let the Committee observe what these acts of bankruptcy were, the Commission of any one of which would make a non-trader a bankrupt. By the 155th Clause seven acts of bankruptcy might be committed by a debtor. One was:—“If any debtor shall, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, depart this realm.” Who was to judge of the motive for which a non-trader departed the realm? There was an all-important difference herein between a person carrying on business and one who was not. The duty of a trader was to be always at his post. If he quitted the country, it was his duty to make suitable arrangements, and to leave no engagements which his representatives could not satisfy. The burden of proving that he did not go abroad to defraud his creditors was, therefore, thrown upon the trader. But a non-trader was not bound to be in the country. He had no place of business at which he was bound to be present. Another act of bankruptcy was defined to be, if the debtor “being out of this realm shall remain abroad.” That was a most astonishing act of bankruptcy to apply to a person who was not in trade. Another Act of Bankruptcy was,

Mr. Edwin James

“If any debtor shall suffer himself to be arrested or taken in execution for any debt not due, or shall suffer himself to be outlawed, or procure his goods, money, or chattels to be attached, sequestered, or taken in execution, or make or cause to be made, either within this realm or elsewhere, any fraudulent grant or conveyance of any of his lands, tenements, goods, or chattels, or make or cause to be made any fraudulent surrender of any of his copyhold lands or tenements, or make or cause to be made any fraudulent gift, delivery, or transfer of any of his goods or chattels, any such debtor doing, suffering, procuring, executing, permitting, making, or causing to be made, with such intent, any of the acts, deeds, or matters aforesaid, shall be deemed to have thereby committed an act of bankruptcy."

By Clause 158 it was enacted that

"If any debtor, having been arrested or committed to prison for debt, or on any attachment for non-payment of money, shall, upon such or any other arrest or commitment for debt or non-payment of money, or upon any detention for debt, lie in prison for fourteen days, or, having been arrested for any cause, shall lie in prison for fourteen days after any detainer for debt lodged against him, and not discharged, every such debtor shall thereby be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy; or if any such debtor, having been arrested, committed, or detained for debt shall escape out of prison or custody, every such debtor shall be deemed to have thereby committed an act of bankruptcy from the time of such arrest, commitment, or detention."

He had read these provisions to show how wholly inapplicable they were to the state of the law that had grown up in regard to the trade of the country. The law gave the trader certain advantages, but stipulated that in return he must regulate his conduct so as not to elude his engagements as a commercial man. But these acts of bankruptcy that were framed and originated for traders were inapplicable to those who were not men of business, and had no business habits. At all events, it was nothing more than justice, if they were going to make an alteration in the law, that they should only apply it to debts contracted hereafter. Another safeguard ought to be inserted in the Bill. The Legislature might very safely permit all non-traders to be made bankrupts on their own petition. The law at present was that if a creditor were in a position to take any debtor in execution, having recovered judgment against him, the debtor might be put in prison either until he paid or until he volunteered himself to come under the Insolvent Act. It always seemed to him that when the creditor had got to the point when he might put the debtor in prison, the law might advantageously dispense with the formality of putting him in prison, and might enable the creditor to summon him before the Court of Bankruptcy, and make him subject to the operation of the Bankruptcy Law. If an alteration were made in these respects it would remove a great objection to the present Bill. By the 173rd section creditors might file an affidavit in the District Court against a debtor, and the Court might issue a summons to show cause why he should not be adjudged a bankrupt, which summons was to be returnable in four days from the issuing thereof; so that as the Bill stood a non-trader might be summoned for £40, to appear in four days, and, if he failed to do so, might be adjudged a bankrupt. Nothing could be more convenient as an engine of oppression than this. At present a summons in the case of traders was returnable in fourteen days; and even this had been regarded in mercantile circles as productive of great hardship; but to extend it to non-traders, and to reduce the time from fourteen to four days, was a proceeding unnecessarily harsh. Unless the Attorney General limited this provision to those cases in which a creditor was in a position to put his debtor in prison, or to cases in which the debtor voluntarily submitted to it, he would deem it his duty to vote for the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, he had given notice to leave out these objectionable clauses. The clause now under discussion made an absolute identity between those who were traders and those who were non-traders, and thus would effect a complete revolution in the law of bankruptcy. There had at all times been a distinction between these two classes in this country, and there was good ground for that distinction, for a man engaged in trade and commerce was bound at all times to meet his engagements, and to be ever at hand both with his person and property; but a man not engaged in trade was not expected to have his estate in a condition to be at once turned into money, to be in a place of business ready to meet his creditor, or if he went abroad, to run the hazard of being adjudged a bankrupt. The vice of the Bill seemed to be that it had many clauses exceedingly proper as applied to traders, but harsh and oppressive to an excessive degree when applied to those not engaged in trade. By virtue of a subsequent clause in the Bill. Any man might be summoned before a Bankrupt Commissioner or County Court Judge for a debt of £40, and, unless he could satisfy the Judge that he could pay not only that debt but any other he might owe, he was to be declared a bankrupt. He doubted whether in any code, however severe, such a clause had ever been found. A man might be on the moors in Scotland, or salmon fishing in Ireland, and be summoned to appear before the Court in London or before any provincial Court, however remote, within four days, to be examined on oath as to his debts. It might be right that a man engaged in commerce should be able at once to pay everybody, but it was not necessary that every man not in trade, from the Archbishop downwards, should be compelled to appear at four days' notice, and pay all his debts, or be declared a bankrupt. There were persons who had their incomes payable only at stated periods, who had no property, and to whom credit was given on the faith that they would pay when their salary was received. But if a malicious creditor summoned such a person before the Court, and it came out that he could not at the time pay his debts, he would be declared a bankrupt. A farmer, as they all knew, looked to his crops to pay his debts; but, supposing he was summoned three or four months before harvest for a debt, the result might be that his crops would pass into other hands, and he would be ruined. He might refer to the case of officers of the army, also, whose pay came in periodically, and who, when moving about from place to place with their regiments, would be liable to be summoned for small debts. Were they to be declared bankrupts because at the time when they were summoned they were unable to pay all their debts? The distinction between traders and non-traders had always prevailed in this country, and was not an arbitrary distinction, but was founded on common sense and the habits of mankind. It might be perfectly right and proper to frame stringent laws for traders, but that was no reason why those who were non-traders should be drawn into the net with them. He believed the parentage of these stringent clauses of the Bill did not belong to the Attorney General, but to certain classes of the mercantile community. The Bill contained provisions unnecessarily harsh towards non-trading debtors, possessing property not immediately convertible, and unnecessarily lenient towards others, possessing no present property, but having expectancies which sooner or later might be realized. It no doubt contained many valuable provisions as regarded the commercial community; but those who were beyond the pale of trade

Mr. Montague Smith

had not been consulted regarding it, and he believed that they were utterly ignorant of the consequences that would follow from the adoption of the Bill as it stood. If a clear distinction was not made between traders and non-traders, the Bill, he believed, would be productive of mischiefs that its framers had never contemplated.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he was sincerely desirous that this Bill should pass, and he agreed with the Attorney General in supporting the principle of this clause, yet he could not help expressing the wish that his hon. and learned Friend had stated to the House the nature of the protection and safeguards with which he meant to accompany it. It might relieve some of his friends from the apprehensions which, not unnaturally, they entertained regarding this clause if they remembered that by the law of Scotland, as amended some years ago, the distinction between traders and non-traders had been wholly abolished, and he was not aware that any serious mischief, or any mischief at all, had arisen from its operation. He must say that, much as he desired to see this Bill pass, he would rather see it withdrawn than not have a distinct assurance from the Attorney General that some strong safeguards would accompany the clause now under consideration. It was impossible not to perceive that almost all the clauses which immediately followed this, for the most part excellent in themselves as regards traders, were altogether inapplicable to a number of other classes in the community whose case seemed to have been entirely forgotten. A trader was bound to be at all times ready to pay his debts—it was of the very essence of the solvency of a trader that he should, at any and every moment, be prepared with any sum of money to meet every demand that might lawfully be brought against him; but would they apply the clauses constituting acts of bankruptcy, for instance, to landed proprietors? He was sorry to say that nine-tenths, or perhaps nineteen-twentieths, of the landed proprietors of the country had their property more or less subject to mortgage. A mortgage debt, though due in point of law, was not intended to be claimed, and ran on year after year; but to apply to such a case the provisions of this Act would be to introduce a revolution in the whole state of property, and the condition in which every man in the kingdom who happened to be a landed proprietor would be placed. A gentleman possessed of an income from landed property of some £2,000 a year might have some debts, though, on the whole, in easy circumstances; there might be a mortgage debt; some ill-natured creditor might issue a summons against him, and unless he was able to satisfy that mortgage debt in four days he was liable to be declared a bankrupt by the Judge in Bankruptcy. He could not agree to such a clause unless the Attorney General at once consented to render inapplicable to non-traders in general the whole series of provisions respecting acts of bankruptcy; and, as an additional safeguard, he would suggest that as to the circumstances in which a non-trader should be made a bankrupt, he should be summoned, not within a given time, for that should in all cases depend on the discretion of the Judge, but only on fair and ample notice given. The debtor should then appear, according to the circumstances of the case, to give such information respecting his affairs as might seem reasonable to the Judge; and if it should appear—but only if it should appear—that he was utterly unable to pay his debts, that he was living on his creditors, and that it was necessary the bankrupt law should be put in operation against him—in these circumstances only should he be made a bankrupt, and thus prevented from wasting the estate. It was necessary to introduce into the Bill the most careful and specific provisions with regard to the notice to all non-traders. A trader was bound to be always in presence to meet his creditors; but non-traders might be absent on the Continent for a year or two without their address being known even to their own families, and these cases could not be dealt with unless satisfactory evidence was given that the absent debtor had proper notice. Before going further with this Bill the Committee had a right to expect from his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General a clear and specific explanation of the safeguards he meant to provide in the case of non-traders.

MR. MALINS concurred in thinking that the question raised by this clause was one of the last degree of importance. It was one of the most valuable provisions of the Bill, providing for the assimilation of the law of debtor and creditor to all classes of the community. He thought it right that every facility should be given for the recovery of debts, and that there should be one uniform system by which those who were unable to pay their debts should have their debts adjudicated. He agreed, however, that many qualifications should be made with reference to non-traders. They should not be liable to be made bankrupts in the manner provided by the Bill; but only after judgment was obtained. The great principle which it was desirable to establish was that those who did not pay their debts should be made with the greatest facility to do so, or at least to make a cessio bonorum to their creditors; and that then, whether traders or non-traders, they should be restored to their original position and to the capacity of acquiring property. Did the Committee think that non-traders who were in debt should be allowed to retain possession of their property by simply crossing the Channel? He was of opinion that if a proper notice were given at the residence of a non-trader, who was abroad, and he did not within a specified time—say a month or six weeks—return and settle with his creditors, every facility should be given to the latter to obtain possession of his property. The reckless habits of extravagance now too prevalent in the upper and middle classes of society would be checked when it was found that debt could not be incurred with impunity. It was said traders were bound to be always ready to meet the claims of their creditors; but ought not non-traders to be equally so bound? By going to Boulogne a debtor could avoid his creditors, or at least could put such difficulties in their way as amounted to an avoidance of them; but this Bill would compel him either to give up all his property for their benefit, or to come home and deal with them as he must do if he were a trader. No doubt proper safeguards ought to be provided, so as to prevent an oppressive creditor from making even a trader bankrupt; but the principle of the clause deserved the approval of the Committee.

MR. CAYLEY said, the question raised in the clause now under discussion was so important that it ought not to be disposed of summarily, and he therefore begged to move that the Chairman report progress.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL hoped the Motion for reporting progress would not be pressed. The House was then as full as he could expect to have it during the discussion of this Bill, and it would be convenient that night to dispose of the question raised by this clause.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE hoped his hon. Friend would persevere in his Motion to report progress. The subject was one of the gravest import, and came on at that

a bankrupt. He doubted whether in any code, however severe, such a clause had ever been found. A man might be on the moors in Scotland, or salmon fishing in Ireland, and be summoned to appear before the Court in London or before any provincial Court, however remote, within four days, to be examined on oath as to his debts. It might be right that a man engaged in commerce should be able at once to pay everybody, but it was not necessary that every man not in trade, from the Archbishop downwards, should be compelled to appear at four days' notice, and pay all his debts, or be declared a bankrupt. There were persons who had their incomes payable only at stated periods, who had no property, and to whom credit was given on the faith that they would pay when their salary was received. But if a malicious creditor summoned such a person before the Court, and it came out that he could not at the time pay his debts, he would be declared a bankrupt. A farmer, as they all knew, looked to his crops to pay his debts; but, supposing he was summoned three or four months before harvest for a debt, the result might be that his crops would pass into other hands, and he would be ruined. He might refer to the case of officers of the army, also, whose pay came in periodically, and who, when moving about from place to place with their regiments, would be liable to be summoned for small debts. Were they to be declared bankrupts because at the time when they were summoned they were unable to pay all their debts? The distinction between traders and non-traders had always prevailed in this country, and was not an arbitrary distinction, but was founded on common sense and the habits of mankind. It might be perfectly right and proper to frame stringent laws for traders, but that was no reason why those who were non-traders should be drawn into the net with them. He believed the parentage of these stringent clauses of the Bill did not belong to the Attorney General, but to certain classes of the mercantile community. The Bill contained provisions unnecessarily harsh towards non-trading debtors, possessing property not immediately convertible, and unnecessarily lenient towards others, possessing no present property, but having expectancies which sooner or later might be realized. It no doubt contained many valuable provisions as regarded the commercial community; but those who were beyond the pale of trade

Mr. Montague Smith

had not been consulted regarding it, and he believed that they were utterly ignorant of the consequences that would follow from the adoption of the Bill as it stood. If a clear distinction was not made between traders and non-traders, the Bill, he believed, would be productive of mischiefs that its framers had never contemplated.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he was sincerely desirous that this Bill should pass, and he agreed with the Attorney General in supporting the principle of this clause, yet he could not help expressing the wish that his hon. and learned Friend had stated to the House the nature of the protection and safeguards with which he meant to accompany it. It might relieve some of his friends from the apprehensions which, not unnaturally, they entertained regarding this clause if they remembered that by the law of Scotland, as amended some years ago, the distinction between traders and non-traders had been wholly abolished, and he was not aware that any serious mischief, or any mischief at all, had arisen from its operation. He must say that, much as he desired to see this Bill pass, he would rather see it withdrawn than not have a distinct assurance from the Attorney General that some strong safeguards would accompany the clause now under consideration. It was impossible not to perceive that almost all the clauses which immediately followed this, for the most part excellent in themselves as regards traders, were altogether inapplicable to a number of other classes in the community whose case seemed to have been entirely forgotten. A trader was bound to be at all times ready to pay his debts—it was of the very essence of the solvency of a trader that he should, at any and every moment, be prepared with any sum of money to meet every demand that might lawfully be brought against him; but would they apply the clauses constituting acts of bankruptcy, for instance, to landed proprietors? He was sorry to say that nine-tenths, or perhaps nineteen-twentieths, of the landed proprietors of the country had their property more or less subject to mortgage. A mortgage debt, though due in point of law, was not intended to be claimed, and ran on year after year; but to apply to such a case the provisions of this Act would be to introduce a revolution in the whole state of property, and the condition in which every man in the kingdom who happened to be a landed proprietor would be placed. A gentleman possessed of an income from landed property of some £2,000 a year might have some debts, though, on the whole, in easy circumstances; there might be a mortgage debt; some ill-natured creditor might issue a summons against him, and unless he was able to satisfy that mortgage debt in four days he was liable to be declared a bankrupt by the Judge in Bankruptcy. He could not agree to such a clause unless the Attorney General at once consented to render inapplicable to non-traders in general the whole series of provisions respecting acts of bankruptcy; and, as an additional safeguard, he would suggest that as to the circumstances in which a non-trader should be made a bankrupt, he should be summoned, not within a given time, for that should in all cases depend on the discretion of the Judge, but only on fair and ample notice given. The debtor should then appear, according to the circumstances of the case, to give such information respecting his affairs as might seem reasonable to the Judge; and if it should appear—but only if it should appear—that he was utterly unable to pay his debts, that he was living on his creditors, and that it was necessary the bankrupt law should be put in operation against him—in these circumstances only should he be made a bankrupt, and thus prevented from wasting the estate. It was necessary to introduce into the Bill the most careful and specific provisions with regard to the notice to all non-traders. A trader was bound to be always in presence to meet his creditors; but non-traders might be absent on the Continent for a year or two without their address being known even to their own families, and these cases could not be dealt with unless satisfactory evidence was given that the absent debtor had proper notice. Before going further with this Bill the Committee had a right to expect from his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General a clear and specific explanation of the safeguards he meant to provide in the case of non-traders.

MR. MALINS concurred in thinking that the question raised by this clause was one of the last degree of importance. It was one of the most valuable provisions of the Bill, providing for the assimilation of the law of debtor and creditor to all classes of the community. He thought it right that every facility should be given for the recovery of debts, and that there should be one uniform system by which those who were unable to pay their debts should have their debts adjudicated. He agreed, however, that many qualifications should be made with reference to non-traders. They should not be liable to be made bankrupts in the manner provided by the Bill; but only after judgment was obtained. The great principle which it was desirable to establish was that those who did not pay their debts should be made with the greatest facility to do so, or at least to make a cessio bonorum to their creditors; and that then, whether traders or non-traders, they should be restored to their original position and to the capacity of acquiring property. Did the Committee think that non-traders who were in debt should be allowed to retain possession of their property by simply crossing the Channel? He was of opinion that if a proper notice were given at the residence of a non-trader, who was abroad, and he did not within a specified time—say a month or six weeks—return and settle with his creditors, every facility should be given to the latter to obtain possession of his property. The reckless habits of extravagance now too prevalent in the upper and middle classes of society would be checked when it was found that debt could not be incurred with impunity. It was said traders were bound to be always ready to meet the claims of their creditors; but ought not non-traders to be equally so bound? By going to Boulogne a debtor could avoid his creditors, or at least could put such difficulties in their way as amounted to an avoidance of them; but this Bill would compel him either to give up all his property for their benefit, or to come home and deal with them as he must do if he were a trader. No doubt proper safeguards ought to be provided, so as to prevent an oppressive creditor from making even a trader bankrupt; but the principle of the clause deserved the approval of the Committee.

MR. CAYLEY said, the question raised in the clause now under discussion was so important that it ought not to be disposed of summarily, and he therefore begged to move that the Chairman report progress.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL hoped the Motion for reporting progress would not be pressed. The House was then as full as he could expect to have it during the discussion of this Bill, and it would be convenient that night to dispose of the question raised by this clause.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE hoped his hon. Friend would persevere in his Motion to report progress. The subject was one of the gravest import, and came on at that might, at one o'clock in the morning, proceed to the consideration of the forty-seven or forty-eight other Bills standing on the paper, with some reasonable prospect of advancing them a stage, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the noble Lord was, no doubt, sincere in his desire to forward public business; but he could not compliment him on his choice of the mode for effecting that purpose. The Motion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, if adopted, instead of being rejected as an inconvenient restraint, would not have applied to the present Bill, which had been taken up at a quarter, and not at half-past twelve, as the noble Lord imagined. The hon. Member for the King's County stated his arguments against the Bill, with his usual ability, and with great fairness; but it was quite evident that the natural time for opposition was to the second reading, when the Bill came on at eight o'clock, and when great numbers of Irish Members were in the House. Four-fifths of the Representatives of Ireland, he ventured to say, eagerly desired that this measure should be adopted. ["No, no!"] The momentary expression of impatience during the speech of the hon. Member for the King's County, had been provoked by his travelling over the general question, which had been largely discussed when the principle of the English Bill was agreed to. Separate Bills for Ireland and Scotland were introduced for convenience of form and procedure. He repudiated the idea that there had been any breach of faith with the House. No distinction whatever had been made between the three kingdoms in the Resolution which was adopted; and it had been distinctly made known, early in the course of the discussion on the English Bill, that measures would be subsequently introduced for the other portions of the United Kingdom.

Mr. O'BRIEN had always supported the removal of restrictions from the spirit trade; but that was a different thing from the support of a monopoly. The feeling of the people of Ireland was not that which had been represented by his hon. Colleague.

Mr. BLAKE believed that this Bill would do more towards promoting temperance and morality in Ireland than any measure that had been passed for many years. The Irish people were very glad to get a glass of wine whenever they could. What he meant was that they would gladly take a glass of wine in preference to a glass of spirits. This Bill would be a blessing to Ireland, and he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for it.

Lord John Manners

Mr. M'MAHON had asked the opinion of several of his constituents, and had not heard one expression of dissent to the Bill, except by a teetotaler, who was in favour of a Maine liquor law.

Mr. BUTT, after the immense preponderance of opinion among Irish Members in favour of the measure appealed to the noble Lord to withdraw the Motion of adjournment.

COLONEL DICKSON denied that the majority of Irish Members were in favour of the Bill, and said that, if they were polled, the measure would certainly be condemned by them. Drinking was the great vice of Ireland. This Bill would encourage drinking, and it would be fraught with great disadvantage to the people.

Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"

Put, and negatived.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 136; Noes 38: Majority 98.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Bill considered in Committee.

In reply to Lord NAAS,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that by this Bill the obligation to pay the licence duty would apply, in Ireland, to those refreshment-houses, not being wine-houses, which were open at night.

House resumed. Committee report Progress; to sit again on Thursday at Twelve of the clock.

House adjourned at Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, July 17, 1860.

MINUTES.] Sat First in Parliament.—The Lord Heytesbury—after the Death of his Father.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Postage (Army and Navy); Nuisances Removal and Diseases Prevention; Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act (1853) Amendment; Crown Debts and Judgments: Inclosure (No. 2); Conjugal Rights (Scotland). 2nd Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh and Montrose), &c.; Burial Grounds (Ireland) Act (1856) Amendment; Friendly Societies Act Amendment; Titles to Land (Scotland) Act (1858) Amendment.

ANNUITY TAX (EDINBURGH, MONTROSE, &c.) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he rose with great satisfaction to move that the Bill be read a second time. Five or six attempts had been made to settle by legislation the disputes arising out of this obnoxious tax; but until now none of these measures had reached their Lordships' House, although more than one had received the sanction of the House of Commons to the second reading, and although it had been the anxious desire of successive Governments to settle this disagreeable, and, as far as Edinburgh was concerned, obnoxious question. To such an extent had the ill-feeling occasioned by this tax been carried in Edinburgh that the officers of justice who endeavoured to enforce payment had been assaulted, and criminal prosecutions brought against the aggressors failed from the impossibility of getting a jury to convict them. The ministers of the Established Church in Edinburgh were not, as in England and other parts of Scotland, supported out of the ancient property of the Church, but entirely by a personal tax, upon the occupiers of houses, which was imposed by an Act of the reign of Charles II. It was analogous to ministers money in Ireland, which had recently been abolished. He was ready to admit the truth of the arguments upon the other side, that property was taken subject to the tax; but the impost was growing more and more obnoxious, and the necessity imposed upon clergymen of having recourse to law to enforce payment called for immediate legislation. The Bill satisfactorily accommodated the difficulty by providing from other means the stipend of £600 a year payable to all the existing ministers of Edinburgh and to their successors, whose number was, as vacancies occurred in certain churches, to be reduced by five. As at present levied the tax was very oppressive, and but a portion of the city of Edinburgh was liable to the demand. The whole College of Justice, moreover, was exempted; so that while the lawyers, who formed a very considerable, and by no means the least thriving portion of the population of the city, had nothing to pay, the poorer classes found themselves subject to a tax of 10*d.* in the pound. To remedy this grievance, and to provide a substitute, the same sum of £2,000, at present derived from the revenues of the Leith Harbour Fund, would be retained; a new arrangement of the moneys received from pew-rents would be made, and the balance would be raised by a fixed rate of 4*d.* in the pound, which would be collected with the police tax, to obviate those conscientious scruples which certain persons might entertain. The security and permanence of the Established Church would thus be provided for, and a difficulty in the way of every successive Government would be got rid of. The magistrates and Town Council of Edinburgh, from whom the noble Marquess opposite had just presented petitions, had been active in urging on various Administrations the necessity of effecting a settlement, but they wholly neglected to suggest a substitute for the tax. Every one of the principles embodied in this Bill had successively received their sanction, and it was with regret and surprise that the learned Lord Advocate learned their determination to oppose it. The Bill had passed the House of Commons by a considerable majority, and all the Scotch Members present, with the exception of two, voted in its favour. He hoped their Lordships would consent unanimously to its adoption, as any Amendments which might now be introduced would endanger its success in the present Session.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that having examined the provisions of the Bill, and watched the spirit in which it had been introduced, he was of opinion that it was an honest attempt to settle a very difficult question. For this reason, therefore, and considering the inexpediency of postponing the settlement of the question, he hoped their Lordships would not endanger the passing of the Bill by introducing any Amendments into it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had represented the city of Edinburgh for some years, and with great pleasure to himself, except for this question of the Annuity Tax, which was the bane of his life. He, along with others, had endeavoured to come to some accommodation on the question, but unsuccessfully; and it was with great pleasure, therefore, that he now saw a Bill introduced which was likely to pass with the approbation of both sides of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

TITLES TO LAND (SCOTLAND) ACT (1858)
AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said, the best mode of acquainting their Lordships with the previous history of this Bill would be to read a letter which he had received from the Lord Advocate on the subject.

"The Titles to Land (Scotland) Bill never was discussed in the House of Commons in any of its stages. It is not a party Bill, but a Bill introducing certain legal reforms in conveyancing, on which both sides are substantially agreed, and the general scope of which was the same as one prepared by the Lord Advocate under Lord Derby's Government. Any difference of opinion which ever existed in regard to it, related to incidental details."

He was glad to say that, whatever party had been in office, there was no diminution in the zeal for legal reform; and he could not but acknowledge that, in this respect, the noble Earl near him had been very fortunate in the selection of his law officers. The Lord Advocate proceeded to say:

"It was introduced on the 8th of March; it was read a second time on the 20th of March without opposition or discussion of any kind. It met with warm approval and careful consideration from the profession in Scotland. On the 7th of May it was committed, pro forma, to have certain Amendments of my own introduced, without a single word of discussion. It was then reprinted, as amended in Committee; a form which every Member of the House of Commons is aware does not imply consideration or discussion. As reprinted it stood for Committee, and has so remained from that time to the present without a single step of progress. It was on three several morning sittings sent with five other Bills to the same Committee; but of these only two made any progress. The rest, including the Titles to Land Bill, have not yet had a single clause considered; and not one word has been said in the House of Commons on any one of its provisions. I thus found myself, on the 9th of July, with six or seven important Scotch measures, only two of which had even entered Committee. I therefore selected the two purely legal measures which might fitly commence in the Lords; stated in my place in the House of Commons that I withdrew them with the intention of having them introduced elsewhere, and placed them next day in your Lordships' hands. They arrive a fortnight sooner than they could have done, even had it been possible to overtake them in the Commons, and will come down when the overcrowding of the orders in that House has ceased. Before I took this step, I arranged all the clauses with the town-clerks and the superiors in a way which is satisfactory to them; and the question with the local registrars, which is a very subordinate one, is the only point on which, as far as I am aware, any difference of opinion exists in any quarter. I only endeavoured, in very difficult circumstances, to prevent two important measures, which would have met with no other obstruction than fair discussion of their details, from being defeated by want of time; nor can I see that any interest, public or private, has suffered by the course I have pursued. These are the facts, and I think it right that your Lordship should be in possession of them."

With regard to the Bill itself, in the year 1858 an Act was passed for simplifying the forms and diminishing the expense of completing titles to land in Scotland; but it did not include burgage tenure; and the great object of this Bill was to extend the same legislation to that class of titles. There was a clause which gave advantages to the registration of deeds in Edinburgh, and the local registrars were afraid that it would abstract business from them; but he was happy to say that the Lord Advocate had come to a satisfactory arrangement with them.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he knew nothing of the merits of the Bill. He still thought that the course adopted by the Lord Advocate was not only unusual, but highly irregular, and one that should not be drawn into a precedent. Whatever that irregularity, however, it was nothing as compared with the irregularity of which the noble and learned Lord had just been guilty: because it certainly was the first time that, in reference to any proceedings in that House, a Member of the other House had been furnished, through the medium of a Member of this House, with an opportunity of making a speech to their Lordships, and by the voice of the Lord Chancellor explaining his reasons for adopting a particular course of proceeding. Such a complication of irregularities as had been effected by the noble and learned Lord in this House, and by the Lord Advocate in the other House, he must say he never recollected in the whole of his Parliamentary experience. With that single observation he would dismiss the question of the Lord Advocate's letter. If the Bill had met with opposition at a particular stage in the House of Commons, it was solely owing to the course which had been pursued by the Lord Advocate himself. It was stated by that learned Lord that the Bill contained the same provisions as the measure of the late Lord Advocate, and which measure met with general approval, although circumstances prevented its passing last year, and it was understood that it would be reintroduced. If the Bill had undergone no discussion in the House of Commons, it was because the Scotch Members were in the habit of facilitating their business more by their action out of doors than in the House; and it was owing to the Lord Advocate having, without an understanding with the Scotch Members, introduced material alterations, that had led to the whole difficulty. Had these alterations and Amendments not been introduced, and had the Bill been carried on as it was originally introduced, no objection would have been raised on either side of the House, and it would long since have come up to their Lordships in the regular course. But the learned Lord chose to introduce a number of Amendments upon which great differences of opinion arose and objections were taken; so that at the time the Bill was withdrawn from the House of Commons, there were four-and-a-half pages of Amendments of which notice had been given. In these circumstances the Lord Advocate withdrew the measure from the House of Commons for the purpose of reintroducing it in this House, and sending it back to the Commons at a late period of the Session. He (the Earl of Derby) might have used the expression that it looked like smuggling a Bill through Parliament. The Lord Advocate rather indignantly repudiated any notion of such an intention, and he was bound to assume that no such intention was entertained; but all he could say was, that if it were desired to smuggle a Bill through Parliament, a more effectual plan could scarcely be devised than to withdraw it from the House of Commons when the Scotch Members were present, to introduce it into this House, and to send it back to the other House in the last few days of the Session, when most of the Scotch Members had left town. He was assured, however, that what had been done had been done in perfect good faith, and he did not hesitate to assume that that was the case. But the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) was very much mistaken and very much misled if he believed that the Bill now lying on the table was the Bill which was withdrawn in the House of Commons, because the Lord Advocate had withdrawn the greater portion of his Amendments and restored the Bill to a form in which it was perfectly satisfactory to the late Lord Advocate. If the same course had been pursued in the other House, there would have been no occasion for any irregularity at all. He acquitted the noble and learned Lord of any desire to obtain an undue advantage; but he could not acquit him of irregularity in the course which he had pursued, still less in the part which he had taken to-night. But, as the Bill was amended, he had no wish to impede its progress, although he hoped in the future more regularity would be observed.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Earl complained very much of the irregularity of the course which the Lord Advocate and the Lord Chancellor had pursued. There might be a certain amount of irregularity, but the letter did not refer to anything which had passed in their Lordships' House. The noble Earl himself had not only been guilty of great irregularity in describing minutely what had passed in the other House, but he was sorry to say had given an impression which was not correct. The Amendments of the Lord Advocate had not been the cause of the delay: and as to the Bill being different now, it was a perfect proof of the good faith of the Lord Advocate, because he could not wish to take any advantage when he endeavoured to put the Bill in a shape which would be acceptable to the House of Commons. He held that the course which had been pursued in regard to this Bill was very desirable and necessary for the furtherance of the public business, the present state of which had attracted the attention of the noble Earl as well as of others.

LORD CRANWORTH hoped the Lord Chancellor would consider the case of the local registrars, whose interests would be seriously affected by this Bill.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he would have been exceedingly sorry if the Lord Advocate had, from any motive whatever, even that of self-defence, written a letter to his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack, referring to any proceedings in their Lordships' House. He had listened carefully, however, to the letter of his right hon. and learned Friend, and did not catch a single allusion, even the most remote, to anything that had passed in this House. In considering the propriety of the course which had been taken, it should be remembered that, whoever objected to the introduction of Bills as now proposed, and contended that they should pass through the other House in regular course, knew very little of the manner in which business was carried on in that House. Whether it was owing to the superhuman eloquence that was now so abundant, or the deeply interesting character of the reasoning, the House of Commons was rapidly justifying its ancient etymology and becoming a Parliamentum, a Colloquium, a place of talk, and of nothing but talk. But, whether from this, or from whatever other cause, it was certainly the case that important measures were delayed in the other House not only for days or weeks but for months, without the possibility of a single step being taken in advance, and then hurried through or thrown over in the most wholesale manner. He understood that this Bill was hung up in the Commons from the 2nd of May to last week, without the least progress being made. He believed, therefore, that the transfer of the measure to their Lordships' House was the most convenient course that could be taken.

THE EARL OF DERBY explained that he did not impute to the Lord Advocate any irregularity in referring to the proceedings of their Lordships' House. He was aware that the right hon. Gentleman had avoided any such allusions, although, of course, the letter was written entirely on account of what had taken place in this House. The irregularity consisted in the Lord Advocate, by means of a letter, practically making a speech in their Lordships' House for the purpose of explaining the course he had pursued in the other branch of the Legislature.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had hoped that after hearing the letter of the Lord Advocate the noble Earl would have apologized for the mistake into which he had fallen. He thought the facts which had been stated must have convinced the noble Earl that there was no foundation for the suspicion that he (the Lord Chancellor) and the Lord Advocate had conspired to smuggle a Bill through Parliament, and now that he was undeceived, some expression of regret was to be expected. He could not see that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had committed any irregularity whatever in writing the letter he had read to their Lordships. He had simply stated the facts, which it was indispensable should be made known for the vindication of his conduct.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had not charged the noble and learned Lord and the Lord Advocate with what he was pleased to term a conspiracy. He must say, however, that the facts of the case, as they came before them on the introduction of the measure, did justify him in calling the attention of their Lordships to the matter, and he should certainly make no apology for having commented upon what he believed to be a Parliamentary irregularity. He never had, and never would apologize for commenting publicly on public matters. If he had hurt the personal feelings of the noble and learned Lord or of the Lord Advocate no one would regret it more than himself; but he was not aware that he had done anything in the course of the discussion which required apology.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the propriety of making an apology was for the noble Earl himself to consider; but he trusted their Lordships would feel satisfied that the Lord Advocate was not open to the charge of having pursued any irregular or underhand course in regard to this Bill.

THE EARL OF DERBY repeated, that he disclaimed the idea of imputing such conduct to the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday, the 26th instant.

CONJUGAL RIGHTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had to offer to their Lordships another Bill, which was the brother, if he might say so, of the one they had been discussing, and which he hoped would meet with a more gentle reception. It was a Bill to amend the Law of Scotland in regard to Conjugal Rights. Had this Bill remained in the other House it would certainly never have reached their Lordships' House during the present Session. The Scotch Courts of law had the power of dissolving marriages, and that power was often abused by collusive expedients being resorted to by Englishmen in order to obtain the advantages of the Scotch law. For instance, it was a common thing for persons to go from England to Scotland for a divorce who were not domiciled there. In consequence this state of things arose. A marriage contract in England could be dissolved in Scotland, and while the parties remained in that country they could marry again and their children would be legitimate; but if they crossed the Border, the English marriage still subsisting, if they married again, they would be guilty of bigamy and their children would be bastards. As English marriages were no longer in-dissoluble, the law of England and Scotland must be regarded as the same. The main object of this Bill was to prevent collusive divorces, by providing that no persons should be allowed to sue for divorce in Scotland unless domiciled there in such a manner that if they were to die their personal property would be administered according to the law of that country. It enacted further, that if a divorce had been regularly and solemnly pronounced by a Scotch Court it should be valid throughout the empire. The noble and learned Lord then laid the Bill on the table.

Lord Brougham

LORD BROUGHAM believed that the Bill which he had unsuccessfully introduced into Parliament in 1835 and 1845, forbidding marriages without a very lengthened residence, would have been a better remedy for the evils of the marriage law of Scotland than the measure of his noble and learned Friend. Nothing could be more vexatious and unsatisfactory than the present state of that law, and he sincerely hoped some amendment would be made in it.

LORD REDESDALE said, it should be remembered that there was a very wide difference in the grounds upon which a divorce could be obtained in England and Scotland. If they extended the force of the Scotch decree to England without greatly altering the Scotch law they would be only giving a wider scope to the abuse which already prevailed.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, it would be better to reserve the discussion upon the Bill until the second reading.

Bill read 1^a.

House adjourned at Half-past Six o'Clock to Thursday next,
Half-past Ten o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, July 17, 1860.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Brighton,
James White, esquire.

EDUCATION BILL—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ADDERLEY moved the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. PEASE moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. The chief clause in the Bill was the first, which provided that no children under twelve years of age should be employed in any continuous labour unless a certificate was produced from a competent master that they were able to read and write, or unless an undertaking was given that they should receive education for at least twenty hours in the month. He admitted the humane intentions of the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill, but, at the same time, he believed that it would operate most unkindly and harshly towards the poor. The children who were to be brought under the operation of the Bill were not in circumstances to be dealt with as children employed in factories and mines were. Many of them were employed as errand boys, and in other such ways, and brought in their little earnings to assist their parents, though from no fault of theirs they had received no education. To come down upon these poor children and compel them to desist from their employments, and from helping their parents, would be a great hardship. He objected to the Bill on this ground, but he might add that no system of education was laid down in the Bill, and there was no machinery by which its object was to be carried out. For these reasons he hoped the House would not agree to the second reading, but that it would agree with him that its provisions were wholly uncalled for.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months.”

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Bill had in its origin a close connection with the Bill for the regulation of Mines, lately under the consideration of the House. The right hon. Gentleman who had brought in the Bill took a different view of the education clause in the Mines Inspection Bill from the view taken by the Government. The first instance of an exceptional legislation of the kind in regard to compulsory education was the prohibition of the employment of children in factories without a certificate of their attendance at school. There was a special interference of Parliament with regard to that class of children, because it was thought the children employed in factories were in a peculiar position. Parliament saw an existing evil, which could not be disputed, and applied a remedy for it in the case of a certain limitted class by the Factory Act, without caring for any logical objections that might be made as to the inconsistency of legislating for one class alone. Some years ago, a Bill was likewise passed for the regulation of mines; and by that measure the employment of women and of children under a certain age was altogether prohibited. That Act had to be renewed this Session, and it was thought desirable to introduce a clause providing that no child should be employed in any mine who could not read or write, and that, when so employed, he should attend school. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) contended, however, that this was very inconsistent, and asked why that legislation should be applied to mines and factories alone, and why it should not be extended to all classes of the community. Now he (Sir George Lewis) was not prepared to say that that argument might not gradually force its way into the minds of the community; indeed he himself concurred in the justice of it in the abstract, and he wished they were in a condition to enforce such a rule with regard to children generally. But they must look at the inherent difficulties of the case. In this country we did not in general make our laws according to the rules of great logicians; we did not act upon abstract principles, but took up particular cases as they occurred, and endeavoured to feel our way from one case to another. By this experimental mode of proceeding we were much more successful in our legislation than if we pursued a more rapid and, perhaps, more logical course. For these reasons, though he gave his right hon. Friend credit for the very best intentions in introducing this Bill, he was not prepared to vote for the second reading.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, it was to be expected that a Bill on education would call forth considerable differences of opinion; but he was not prepared for the sort of opposition now offered to the measure. It was admitted that the principle of the Bill was on the whole right, but it was not thought expedient to attempt to carry that principle into effect. He did not think that was a kind of opposition which should induce his right hon. Friend to withdraw the Bill. If the question involved was one of principle, let them fight the question of principle; if, on the other hand, it was a question of detail, let them go on to discuss the details. It had long been generally admitted that our system of education, and the centralized establishment of Government aid in support of schools all over this country, did not produce an amount of benefit commensurate with their cost. The cause of this inadequate result was alleged by the school inspectors to be the fact that children did not attend or remain long enough at the schools to acquire the needful instruction. Now he heartily disapproved of all the schemes which had been propounded for compelling the parent to send his child to school. The relation between parent and child was one with which the State had no right to interfere, but the relation between the employer and the child was a public relation, by means of which the parent might be stimulated to do his duty. The schemes for tempting the child to remain at school, by offering prize grants and capitation grants, were all objectionable, resulting only in the education of a few dozen pupils to a high standard. If, however, children had a right to education, it was the duty of the State to see that their education was not neglected. That would be done if care was taken, as provided by the Bill, that no employer should employ a child without seeing that he was to some extent educated. The effect of this would be to impress on parents the duty of educating their children, as it would be more profitable for themselves, and he did not believe that it would at all interfere with employment of children. Under the measure children would be employed at an age not much later than at present, but for a year or two before they went to work they would go to school instead of running about idle. To meet such cases as that of a farmer or other employer in a district where there might be no school, a provision would be inserted that the master should not be subject to the penalty, unless it could be shown that he had the means of sending the child to school, and that he refused to do so. The Bill was an attempt to promote voluntary education, and decentralisation as regarded educational efforts, and on that account he thought it entitled to the consideration of the House.

Sir George Lewis

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sure that those Members who were not now present would be in no small degree surprised, when they found that the House had been engaged in the discussion of a measure quite as difficult as a Bill for Parliamentary Reform. The benches of the House were nearly empty, and why? It was not because no interest was felt in this question; for he believed if it had been made known that a matter of such vast importance was to be seriously urged upon their attention, the House would have been crowded, and at least five nights' debate would have been required before the Bill could have been disposed of. There was no want of interest in the question; but it was felt that the debate would be nothing but a simple exercitation—an occasion on which they could make abstract speeches, but that the passing of the Bill at the present moment was as much out of the question as a Bill to abolish the House of Commons. His right hon. Friend had raised most prematurely a discussion on this question. No doubt, much could be said in favour of the abstract duty of giving education to these children; so much, indeed, that many Members would be loth to be compelled to give an adverse vote on the subject. This was a difficult question that would in due time force itself upon the attention of the House. Such were the difficulties of the case; such were the threatening circumstances arising from the heavy expenditure for education that had been going on for some years, that he was not willing to interfere with, or prejudge, the right consideration of the subject by premature discussions like the present. The public mind was absolutely unprepared to deal with this question. He did not say that the subject was one which might not, with advantage, be the theme of excellent speeches at the Statistical Society, or the Social Science Association; and he was inclined to suggest that to these places the present discussion should be adjourned. But it was not the practice of that House to make its floor the floor of a debating society. It was their habit, in the course of their legislation, to proceed with reference to practical duties. They were bound to rest on this question for the results of experience. The working of the Factory Act had, no doubt, been satisfactory; but they ought to take time to ascertain the result, in the case of mines, before they proceeded to make the education of children spread over the whole community compulsory. It was utterly impossible that any practical result could flow from the Bill being pressed at the present moment; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not compel Members to take the painful course of voting against a measure, the discussion of which could only have the effect of prejudging a great and important question.

MR. HENLEY argued that the House had great reason to complain of being called upon to discuss such a Bill at that time, the Bill having been brought in on the 26th of April. He had heard the speech of his right hon. Friend below (Sir Stafford Northcote) with much astonishment. The people of the country were not to be hoodwinked by a fine distinction; and when the right hon. Gentleman said that he would not consent to impose any compulsory education, they would ask him what could be more compulsory than to pass a law, declaring that those who did not acquire an education should not work, and consequently that they should not eat. He (Mr. Henley) believed that in many instances a child, when employed, and taking home his little earnings to his parents, was learning more than one who merely went to school to learn to read and write under the compulsion of the State. The right hon. Member for Staffordshire had carried his speculations rather too far in this Bill. The effect of such a measure would be to dry up the sources of voluntary effort, and to interfere most injuriously with the combined system of voluntary and State education that at present existed.

MR. BUXTON: The scope of this Bill, Sir, is to put a dead stop throughout the kingdom to the employment of any child who cannot produce a certificate from a competent master of his being able to read and write. Now, Sir, every one familiar with schools knows that there are tens of thousands of children who, either from their dulness, idleness, or obstinacy, never could obtain such a certificate from any competent schoolmaster. There are tens of thousands of children whose parents, from drunkenness, or poverty, or other causes, never could and never would give them the necessary schooling. Are all those children to starve? Are all those children to be cut off from employment? Again, great numbers of children would be certain to lose their certificates. Are those children to starve? Again, the schoolmaster is to certify to the child's acquirements. Who will certify the schoolmaster's competence to judge? These difficulties are on the surface. Furthermore, this measure is needless. Education is steadily making way. There is no need to hurry it forward by dint of legal penalties. And, if you impose penalties at all, at least impose them justly. Do not lay them on the employer whose tie with the child is artificial, lay them on the parent who is naturally responsible for the child's well-being. But depend upon it, by thus cracking legal penalties about the ears of employers, you will chill the warm interest which most of them are now beginning to feel in the education of the children around them. Sir, it may be said that all this is theoretical, while practically such legislation has answered well. But it is not on the ground of our legislation of that kind having answered well—it is expressly on the ground that it is answering ill that we are called upon to extend it. The right hon. Gentleman told us the other day that the motive for carrying this Bill is that our legislation so far has been unjust and mischievous. In the circular that has been sent round to us in favour of the Bill the same phrase is used. Mr. Norris, in his memorial, which gave rise to this Bill, states, “that our proceedings hitherto have been impolitic as regards the children, because at the cost of much vexatious interference little or no educational benefit is obtained.” He has seen a great deal of the working of that legislation in the case of print works and coal mines. With regard to the print works, he tells us “that there is little or no educational value in the result.” With regard to coal mines, he says it has no effect in sending the children to school. No condemnation of our compulsory legislation can be stronger than these statements from the lips of those who plead for this extension. Sir, if the promoters of this measure had argued on its behalf that similar legislation with regard to factories had been successful, as I believe it has, that argument might have seemed plausible. It would not, however, have been valid, because factories are under most exceptional conditions. In factories it is possible to have relays of children. In factories it is easy to maintain a minute system of inspection. Our success, therefore, in that peculiar case, would give small promise of success elsewhere, as, indeed, we see in the case of print works and coal mines. However, that is not the plea of the right hon. Gentleman. His plea is not that our legislation has succeeded, but that our legislation has failed. It puts one in mind of the surgeon in Gil Blas, who, when he had bled his patient to death, said that what was wanted was a little more bleeding. I doubt the soundness of that logic. No doubt its meaning is, that where your legislation is partial, it merely throws the untaught children into other channels of employment; but that if all were closed, the children would be driven from all employment into school. Sir, that is a vast enterprise. To dam up every channel of employment throughout the kingdom to every child that cannot bring a certificate of education from a competent schoolmaster is a huge undertaking. One naturally asks what is the machinery by which it is to be carried out. Sir, the Bill provides no machinery at all. What success this species of legislation has had has been mainly owing to a system of minute supervision by inspectors with annual Reports, and so forth; but the promoters of this Bill, in the memorial to the Home Office, openly acknowledge that, “to cover the country with a system of inspection, such as now prevails over the small area of the factory districts, is out of the question.” And, accordingly they sit down content with the strange illusion that the bare existence of such a law would be enough to induce employers every where to reject uncertified children out of simple reverence for the law of the land. Sir, I put it to the good sense of the House whether the people of this country are fools enough to look upon us or our decrees with such awful devotion as to put themselves to serious loss and inconvenience, simply because we had desired them to do so. The plain truth is, that in 999 cases of 1,000, this law would be a dead letter. In the thousandth case it might be enforced. It might be enforced where some informer had a spite against an employer. It would only be enforced so rarely, so capriciously, that it would do nothing towards promoting education. But, then, it may be said, if it does no good it will do no harm. Sir, it will do great harm; no legislation is more hurtful than penal legislation, which can only be executed rarely and capriciously. It lulls men into false security, and then, at the instigation of some spiteful informer, it makes a criminal of an individual who is no worse than his neighbours. Again, those more scrupulous men who subject themselves to the law, because it is the law, are put at a disadvantage as compared with those who disregard the law. But further, I look with alarm at the increasing tendency of the House to extend legislation beyond its natural province. We seem, step by step, to be introducing a system of minute surveillance over the private interests of the people, for which our only precedents are those afforded by the police restrictions of other lands. Hitherto, no doubt, we have confined ourselves to legislating on behalf of children. What guarantee have we that legislation will stop there? We are often told that some day the House will be far more under the hand of the working class, and especially of the Trades Unions, than it is now. Will it not then be asserted, plausibly asserted, that if you may interfere to protect the child from his employer, you may interfere to protect the adult. The working class will surely think that the principle of such interference has been sanctioned by such measures as the one before us. Just look at the principle upon which it is advocated. Mr. Norris, in his memorial, expressly bases it on the principle that "it is just as much the proper business of Government to maintain the security of persons, as to maintain the security of property." "Now," he says, "the former of these require protection from every Act which tends to impair the physical, moral, or intellectual happiness of any class in the community." Sir, if that principle be conceded by this House, as embodied in the Bill before us, it will be impossible at any future time to refuse to the trades unions any legislative interference between master and man which they may demand, on the ground that it would advance their moral or intellectual welfare. I shall vote against the Bill, because it would be practically useless, because its principle is false, and the precedent thus set would be full of danger.

Mr. Buxton

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had attempted to overwhelm him upon that occasion by one of those torrents of exaggerated eloquence which, whatever might be the question at issue, the opponents of the right hon. Gentleman had reason to dread. But neither the right hon. Gentleman nor any other Member who had taken part in the discussion had said one word against the principle on which the Bill was founded. The measure would merely apply generally a provision which the House has already adopted in a number of isolated cases. They had been told by various speakers to await the results of experience; but the truth was the experiment had been going on for twenty years. The principle of the Bill was that no very young children should be employed for their whole time without receiving at least the rudiments of education. That was a principle which had already been sanctioned by the House, and it was somewhat strange to see the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who a few weeks ago got a partial Bill passed through the House, now stand up and oppose a general measure of the very same nature. He denied that the principle was compulsory; at the utmost it was prohibitory of the absolute prevention of education. It was said to be a vicious interference with the rights of employers; but the Bill simply provided that an employer should not take a child into his service if he found him wholly uneducated without giving him the means of obtaining elementary instruction for at least five hours in the week. No employer would object to giving a child such facilities for instruction unless he was determined resolutely and of malice to oppose the education of children. The principle embodied in the Bill had been sanctioned in the case of factories and mines, and he could not see why any objection should be raised to the general application of the principle.

MR. W. EWART supported the second reading on the ground that it was a case in which the State had a right to interfere. He maintained that if in the case of factories and mines the State was entitled to step in, so it was entitled in any case of the continuous employment of children. He approved of the Scotch and American as opposed to the Continental system of education.

MR. HARDY said, he objected to the very principle of the Bill, inasmuch as it was essentially one of a compulsory character. If it were adopted by the House they ought to have for the future a State education instead of the present denominational education; they ought to have an education supported by a rate instead of an education supported upon the voluntarily principle. He was entirely opposed to such a change. He believed that by the present free system they were doing their best to educate the people for the duties they had to discharge in life; and if they were to overthrow that system they would have to provide in every portion of the country schools to which parents could have no objection to send their children. Their factory legislation had been founded on the belief that factory children were exposed to special disadvantages; that they were employed for an excessive length of time in heated rooms; and that their health was in consequence permanently injured and their growth stunted. It was true that the principle of the Factory Act had recently been extended to the case of children employed in mines and collieries; but that measure also had been supported upon special grounds, and they had not yet had an opportunity of ascertaining what would be result of the experiment. He would add that he believed it to be a case in which it would be most unwise to adopt a mathematical rule to be enforced with unchanging severity.

MR. BAZLEY said, he could testify to the great practical benefits derived from the operation of the Factory Act in Lancashire—benefits to the employers, as well as to workpeople. In his own business, he had a more skilful and more dutiful race of workers now than formerly. More than 2,000 children had received elementary instruction in his schools, and he believed they had become excellent members of society; from amongst them he had been able to select overlookers, clerks, and efficient assistants in various responsible situations. The good which had been done could not be denied, and he believed the working people were less necessitous, better capable of earning their own bread, and certainly less criminal than they used to be. Among the thousands of people he had employed, he did not know a single instance in which an individual had been taken before a magistrate, and he would distinctly state that in no one case had any individual been convicted of crime. They were intelligent, they were dutiful, and he believed they would be less disposed to combine or conspire against their employers now than when they were in a state of comparative ignorance. The defect of the present system, however, was, that it did not provide for the neglected children wandering in our streets. He hoped a Select Committee on the whole subject would be moved for next Session.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he represented a district in which a portion of the population were suffering considerable distress from the effects of the recent legislation; and he hoped the House would not aggravate that evil by the adoption of the present measure. It would be nothing less than an insult to the starving people of Coventry to tell them that they could not obtain employment for their children unless those children were educated. The Bill was an extravagant exaggeration of the principle on which the Factory Act was founded; and he was afraid that if it were to receive the sanction of Parliament it would endanger the permanence of that Act.

Mr. Hardy

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that the effect of the Bill had been greatly misunderstood. The Bill would not prevent the employment of a boy because he could not read or write, but only enact that in such a case the employer should be compelled to see that he learned. He must express the interest and pleasure with which he had listened to the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, whose valuable testimony on the practical success of the Factory Act was of more weight than twenty speeches founded on mere theory. He did not agree with the opponents of this Bill, who would leave the education of the people to mere chance and charity, nor could he see any reason why they should not extend to other employments the principle they had adopted in the case of children employed in factories and in mines and collieries. He should vote for the second reading of the Bill if the Motion were pressed to a division, but he believed that there would be no use in attempting to proceed beyond that stage, with it in the course of the present Session. As a friend to education, however, he would rather wait for the Report of the Royal Commission, which, he hoped, would not be long delayed.

MR. H. A. BRUCE observed that in the mining districts education was far more general, and crime less common than in the other parts of the Empire. He believed, however, the effect, as in the case of the Factory Act, would be to diminish the number of children employed. Under the Factory Act one-half of the children formerly employed were thrown out of employment altogether. By the last reports it was shown that before the Factory Act came into operation 58,000 children were employed in factories. Three years afterwards less than one-half of that number were employed, and in 1857, notwithstanding the great increase of factories that had taken place, the numbers were still within 10,000 of what they had been before the passing of the Act. He believed that a like effect would be produced under the Mines Inspection Bill, and that many children would be thrown out of employment. At Merthyr Tydvil, where he was interested in iron works, there were 2,400 children employed, and being educated; and he had been informed by an intelligent agent that a visible improvement had taken place in the district, and that there was not one-tenth of the drunkenness that formerly prevailed. He had himself when in the district found the people better able to understand and appreciate arguments than formerly, and altogether a great improvement had been effected. Believing that the Bill before the House was based on a right principle, he should vote for the second reading.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he could see no objection to the Bill; on the contrary he believed that it proceeded upon a right principle; and he trusted that that principle would yet receive the support of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and of other Members who had that day opposed the measure. The money and the labour of the State were employed in punishing crime; and there could surely be no reason why the State should not endeavour to secure for children that education by which crime might be prevented. When at Vevay he had been informed by a Swiss gentleman that in Switzerland when a parent neglected to educate a child they took the child from him— nolens volens —and instructed him against the parent's will. The gentleman added that they could not exist as republicans in Switzerland with an ignorant people. He cordially supported the Bill of his right hon. Friend.

MR. BAINES said, he believed the Bill to be perfectly unnecessary. It was compulsory and not needed, and was contrary to the spirit of the free constitution of the country. The course of education was great and rapid, and people were doing voluntarily what many benevolent persons sought to compel them to do. In the course of that debate they had heard what great things were being done for education in the rural districts, in the Potteries, and in the mining and manufacturing districts. All classes were alive to the value of education, including both employers and the employed; and such were the agencies at work, that he believed they could not prevent the people from being educated if they desired to do so. He maintained, then, that compulsion was not required, and it was a nobler thing to be educated in accordance with the spirit of freedom than according to a system of universal compulsion. Religion was the best thing of all, but they did not make religion compulsory. Sunday schools had done a great deal of good, but they did not compel the children to attend. To carry out the principle of compulsory education they must have recourse to compulsory religion, and to compulsory attendance at places of worship. He believed the people would be educated, and that there was a universal feeling in favour of it, but let the right hon. Gentleman take care that while he was endeavouring to bring in a law to his aid that could not be executed, he did not make the people disregard the law. On that account the right hon. Gentleman should check his zeal, and by leaving the people to themselves the great end he had in view would be accomplished.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 122: Majority 71.

Words added.

Main Question, as Amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

THE TENPENNY INCOME TAX.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, with reference to the Grant to Her Majesty of tenpence in the pound on Property and Incomes, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury how he proposes to carry out the financial arrangement submitted by Her Majesty's Government to this House, and on the faith of which such Grant of tenpence in the pound was made? In the absence of the noble Lord, perhaps some other Member of the Government will answer the question.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, the only answer I can give to the question of the hon. Member is that the Act for the provision of the Income Tax of tenpence in the pound, having been passed by both branches of the Legislature and received the assent of the Crown, has become the law of the land, and it is the duty of the Commission of Inland Revenue to carry it into effect in the same manner as previous Acts for the same purpose.

MR. WHALLEY said, his question did not refer to the Income Tax, but to the financial arrangements (of which the Income Tax formed part) that had been submitted to the House by the Government.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I do not know how I can answer the hon. Gentleman's question more directly than I have done, but he heard the statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night, who gave a full exposition of the views of the Government with respect to the supplementary Ways and Means necessary for the rest of the year. I have nothing whatever to add to that exposition, and I apprehend that if the hon. Member repeats this question as to the financial arrangements of the year, either to the First Lord of the Treasury or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they can only adhere to that statement. I understood the hon. Gentleman to refer to the Income Tax. If that was not the subject of his inquiry, then I apprehend the full and very clear statement of my right hon. Friend would furnish a complete answer to his question.

PAPER DUTIES REPEAL BILL.
QUESTION.

LORD FERMOY said, he wished to ask a question which involved a point of order. He was anxious to know whether the Motion he had put upon the Paper would entitle him to precedence. That Motion was to the effect—"That the rejection by the House of Lords of the Bill for the repeal of the Paper Duties is an encroachment on the Rights and Privileges of the House of Commons, and it is therefore incumbent upon this House to adopt a practical measure for the vindication of its Rights and Privileges."

MR. SPEAKER: A question of privilege to be entitled to precedence must refer to some matter that has recently arisen, and which calls for the present interposition of the House. Now, it cannot be said that the subject-matter of the noble Lord's Resolution has recently arisen, because twelve days ago the noble Lord the First Lord of the Treasury proposed Resolutions to this House on the same subject, which were adopted by a large majority. While the House reserves to itself on every occasion the power of at once proceeding with any matter which may appear urgent, still it does not admit the claim of hon. Members to precedence, unless the prescribed requirements are all fulfilled. It certainly seems to me that in the present instance those requirements have not been fulfilled, and I do not think the noble Lord is entitled to precedence.

HOSTILITIES IN NEW ZEALAND.
QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he wished to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the
Sir George Lewis

Colonies, Whether any accounts have been received of the people of the provinces of New Zealand, not immediately threatened by Maori hostilities, volunteering for the assistance of their fellow-colonists at Taranaki; whether any intimation has been received from the Colonial Government of its intention to propose to the Colonial Parliament any Vote for the purpose of contributing to the expense of the Civil War; or whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government that the whole expense should be defrayed from the Imperial Treasury?

MR. CHILDERS said, he also would beg to ask whether any offers of assistance in suppressing the insurrection in New Zealand has been made by the people of the Australian Colonies, and particularly by those of Victoria?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, in answer to the last question he could state that the Government were aware that very liberal and gallant offers had been made by the Australian Colonies, and particularly from Melbourne, whence the volunteers were ready to proceed if necessary to New Zealand to assist their fellow-countrymen in their struggle. He was not, however, aware that any of these offers had been accepted, or that any of those volunteers had actually gone to New Zealand. With respect to New Zealand itself, they knew that the inhabitants of Auckland had been active in regard to the raising of volunteer militia for the defence of their own neighbourhood should it unfortunately be attacked; but, as far as the Government were aware, they had not proceeded, and were not likely to proceed to Taranaki. The Government had not heard of any proposition on the part of the Governor to submit such a Vote as his right hon. Friend's question referred to the Colonial Parliament, which had not yet met; but they had no reason to believe that it was the intention of the New Zealand Government to call upon the Imperial Government to defray the expense of the efforts made by the colonists in the way of raising volunteers and militia. It would be premature now to announce what would be the arrangements of Her Majesty's Government in respect to defraying the cost of the hostilities still in progress.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).
ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. BUTT said, he rose to move that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, representing that the House had learned with regret that many of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland were prevented by conscientious objections from availing themselves of the benefit of the funds voted by the House for the promotion of national education in Ireland; and praying Her Majesty to direct inquiries to be made whether such changes might not be made in the rules under which that grant was distributed as would enable all classes in Ireland to enjoy the advantages which that grant was intended to secure to the Irish people. The question involved was whether Ireland was to be treated in the same manner as this country, and whether an educational system which had grown up to gigantic dimensions was to be administered in deference to or in disregard of the feelings of a large portion of the population of that country. Towards the support of the system inaugurated by the Earl of Derby the grant in 1831 had been £30,000, in 1851 it had increased to £100,000, and in 1858 it had reached £270,000, and for this year it stood at the same amount. £30,000 was spent upon what were called model schools; nearly £20,000 upon agricultural schools; and the sum spent upon education generally throughout the country was £131,000. Here was a Board appointed by the Crown administering a revenue gradually approaching in amount the aggregate of the stipends received by the parochial clergy of the Establishment. The Board possessed great power, and controlled absolutely the education of the lower classes in Ireland. He was sure that such a system was not within the spirit of a free Government; and that if it were introduced into England it would be strongly protested against. But what he wished to call attention to was, that in Ireland a considerable number of the Roman Catholic population refused, from conscientious motives, to avail themselves of the assistance offered them by the State for the education of their children. Almost the whole of the Protestant population repudiated any connection with the system also from conscientious motives. Was that, then, he asked, a state of things that ought to be encouraged? About five years ago the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) brought forward the case of the Protestant population of Ireland in reference to the system of national education in a speech marked by much eloquence and argument. He (Mr. Butt) cordially subscribed to that admirable sentiment with which the right hon. Gentleman opened his speech on that occasion—namely, that when the State voted large sums of money for the education of the people, they had no right to exclude any one class from its benefit. The Roman Catholic prelates however alleged that system was not adapted to the Roman Catholic population, and every Protestant clergyman who partook of the grant said he only accepted of the system in the absence of any other—that it was simply a choice of evils, either to accept the system of education that was offered, or to leave the children under his charge without any education at all. The system was based upon toleration, but in its action it was most intolerant. Unless a person submitted to the rules of the Commissioners he could not be permitted to share in the advantages. A system was called national, to which the whole nation was opposed.

In 1831, when the system was introduced into Parliament by the present Earl of Derby, it was stated that its main object was to protect parental authority, and to give every opportunity for the education of children without requiring the sacrifice of the slightest principle of conscience or the cherished convictions of the heart. It was also established as one of united education; and upon that ground alone could the rules which had been established by the Board, and the sacrifice of religious action which was required from the various denominations, be justified. Had the system, then, succeeded as one of united education, under which the children of parents of different religious denominations should be educated in the same school? Quite the reverse. He might be told that it educated so many Protestant and Roman Catholic children; but that fact did not prove it to have succeeded as a combined system of education. Now, he had not been able to obtain a statement showing how many Protestant and Roman Catholic children were mixed together in those schools in Ireland. He knew, however, that in more than 2,000 schools or more than one-half there was no admixture of children whatever; that those schools were administered by Roman Catholics, and the pupils were all Roman Catholics; and in the few schools that were administered by Protestant clergymen there were no Roman Catholic children. The returns obtained by Lord Clancarty in a Committee of the House of Lords, moreover showed that in the few schools in which there was an admixture of Roman Catholic and Protestant children the proportions of the former were immense as compared with the latter. It was, then, generally admitted that as a mixed system of education it had utterly failed. In Youghal, the borough which he had the honour to represent, there was a large population of Roman Catholics; there was also a considerable Protestant population, consisting principally of artisans, who would be glad to avail themselves of any system of education for their children which they could conscientiously share in. There was a large number of zealous clergymen in that part of the country, and yet there was not in Youghal a single school receiving sixpence out of this large grant of public money. The Protestant clergymen said that the national system called upon them to exclude the Scriptures from their schools, and they would not consent to such a condition. The Roman Catholic clergymen said that the system of education in these schools was inconsistent with their conscientious feelings, and they could not accept it. So that both parties raised voluntary funds from the population for the support of their respective schools. The same principle was adopted in many other parts of Ireland. There was a large number of the Government schools connected with convents and monasteries. Surely it never could be supposed that in such schools there could be anything like a mixed education. He had before him the evidence of officers of the Board in reference to these convent schools. The secretary of the Board said that those schools, like all others under the national system, must be bond fide opened to children of all denominations, but that, on account of the peculiar and distinctive character of those particular schools, no Protestant children attended them. The secretary further observed that he had always considered those schools as exceptional, and that none but Roman Catholic children attended them. It was his (Mr. Butt's) opinion that no Protestant could conscientiously send his children to them. Now, in making these observations, he must say he should consider it a great misfortune if the aid were withdrawn from those convent schools. He would confess, that when he made inquiries into these institutions he approached them, like many other persons, with some degree of prejudice; but, like others, he had soon satisfied himself of the extreme value of the services which the nuns rendered to the cause of female education and was highly gratified by the neatness, efficiency, and order that prevailed in their schools. He was anxious, therefore, to bear his unbiassed testimony to their value. At the same time he should contend that they proved a departure from the principle of the system administered by the Board. He might mention one fact as illustrative of the inequality and injustice of the system. In the town of Youghal there was a convent school in which nearly 400 Roman Catholic girls received education. An English Protestant woman, who happened to be residing there whilst her husband was in the Baltic during the war, sent her two children to this school, where, unfortunately, they learned how to bless themselves. The mother was astonished at finding that they were receiving a Catholic education, and made a formal complaint upon the matter. An inquiry was instituted, and it was discovered that in the school, intended exclusively for Roman Catholics, the teachers were in the habit of reading during work hours some religious book. Thereupon, for no other reason than because two Protestant children had accidentally found their way into the school the Board put a stop to the reading of religious works, except during the hours set apart for religious instruction, and thereby, as he thought, interfered with the right of Roman Catholics to a free education. Similar incidents were occurring day after day in Ireland, and they were far from being calculated to promote goodwill among Protestants and Roman Catholics. Under the care of religious ladies observances were mixed up with what he would call the poetry of children's existence, which gave birth to the most sacred feelings. But if by accident a little "heretic" should find its way into such a school, suspicion and mistrust were sure to follow, and ladies who devoted themselves to the education of their poorer brethren were alarmed and vexed by the visits of Government officials asking them why they dared to commit the abominable crime of having the Ave Maria inscribed upon their walls.

Mr. Butt

The condition on which the Board gave assistance was that religion should not be mixed up with the education of the children. The Protestants objected to that exclusion. It was not so much the Protestant clergyman that objected to it as the parents who now asked him (Mr. Butt) to claim for them the aid of the State in the education of their children without being called upon to sacrifice their religious convictions. They had been taught to venerate the Bible, and they wished it to be interwoven with every moment of their children's education. Was that a feeling so unreasonable that they must be called on to give it up? That was the case of the Protestants of Ireland. The Roman Catholics said exactly the same thing in other words. They did not regard religion as a thing that ought to be relegated to a particular hour of the day, but they wished it to be mixed up with every portion of the education of their children. Both the great religious denominations in Ireland were dissatisfied with the policy pursued by the National Board in granting aid to schools. The Earl of Derby, then Lord Stanley, in a speech delivered in the House of Commons in 1839, contended that religion should be mixed up with the whole system of education; and upon that principle assistance was given to schools in England. Every denomination in this country was allowed the privilege of educating their children in their own faith; why, then, should such a privilege be denied to the people of Ireland? The Roman Catholics, as well as Protestants, were placed in a worse position in this respect in Ireland than they were placed in England. The Roman Catholic in Ireland had not less regard for his faith than the Roman Catholic in England, nor did the Irish Protestant venerate his Bible less than his English co-religionist. The National system in Ireland was not a united but a separate education. In the county of Cork 80,000 Roman Catholic children received education in the National schools, and only 740 Protestant children. For the sake of those 740 Protestants the Board interfered with the religious rights and free education of the 80,000 Catholics. What reason was there for that? Could not the Board protect the Protestant children without interfering with the right of the Roman Catholics to a free education? Again, when a Protestant parent said he conscientiously objected to send his child to a school in which the Bible was not interwoven with the whole education of his child, why did the Government seek to coerce his conscience? The present Earl of Derby, when Mr. Stanley, in 1831, wrote a celebrated letter, in which he announced the formation of the National Board in Ireland, and the principles by which it was to be guided. The language of the writer was decisive upon this point. He would ask his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he might not write an exact paraphrase of the letter in respect of the present system of National education? Ought less to be done now to meet the conscientious objections of Protestants than was done at the time the letter was written to meet those of the Roman Catholics?

He was entitled to assume that which every witness before the Lords' Committee testified to—namely, the entire failure of this system as combined education—that is, as combined education in one school; and what he would suggest was that in every place where the people themselves wished for a school based on purely Roman Catholic or purely Protestant principles aid should be given to such school, provided that the managers were willing to submit it to the inspection of the National Board. He did not wish to compromise on matters of such moment as religious principles. He believed they would make men better Christians by sending them out in the world with a deep conviction of the truths of Christianity brought home to their hearts, by instruction in their own religion, than they would by sending them out after an education conducted on the principle of a false conciliation. Protestantism, if true, as he believed it to be, would then have a far better chance than by educating the child according to a method of compromise. Let a child be educated in the religion in which the parent desired the child to be educated. However, the Motion he should submit to the House did not pledge any one to any particular view of the question, but merely declared that many persons in Ireland were prevented by their religious convictions from availing themselves of the funds voted for the promotion of National education. He asked the House to state that truth, and to address the Queen to institute an inquiry on the subject. He trusted that a Royal Commission, which might devise some means for removing the objections of the Roman Catholic Prelates and of the Protestant people, would be issued, and that a system would be founded which, conciliating the feelings of all classes, might be called a National system. The Irish people of every class and section were not in favour of the present combined system of education, and such being the case, he asked whether it was consistent with the free spirit of the institutions of this kingdom, or fair to the population of Ireland, that there should be this power of interfering with the prejudices and feelings of the nation. It was by letting the feelings of individuals freely develop themselves that every nation became great, but by imposing restrictions on persons, and by binding them down to peculiar plans, their energies were deadened, and that was the system applied to Ireland. In the name of freedom and of truth, he desired that such rules in respect to education in Ireland might be adopted as would enable every one in that country to enjoy the advantages of education without doing violence to their conscientious convictions.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, representing that this House has learned with regret that many of Her Majesty’s subjects in Ireland are prevented by conscientious objections from availing themselves of the benefit of the funds voted by this House for the promotion of National Education in Ireland; and praying Her Majesty to direct inquiries to be made whether such changes might not be made in the Rules under which that Grant is distributed as would enable all classes in Ireland to enjoy the advantages which that Grant is intended to secure to the Irish people.”

MR. WHITESIDE: I have the honour to represent a very different constituency than that which returns the hon. and learned Member, and yet I find it my duty to give him my cordial support. Of course, it will not be necessary for me now to trouble the House by proposing the Motion on the same subject of which I had given notice, or to trespass on the attention of the House when the Irish Education Vote may be brought forward, as the question, as far as I am concerned, may be disposed of on the present occasion. About this time last year the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland was called on to express his opinion on this important subject, and he fairly stated that his then brief tenure of office and comparative unacquaintance with Ireland at that time disabled him from giving any opinion on the most critical part of the question, but he undertook to consider it, and to be prepared on a future occasion to state to the House what course the Government meant to pursue. The first question is whether the objection to the existing system is taken by the Church. Now, I avow frankly that while the hon. and learned

Mr. Butt

Gentleman (Mr. Butt) has spoken for the nation, I set forward mainly the objections of the Protestant clergy and laity to the system as it stands. Well, the first question to consider is, are those conscientious objections? The other day we heard the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) say that against a particular measure of the Government he, and the respectable party with which he acted, had an instinctive feeling and a conscientious scruple. That scruple was attended to. In spite of the sarcasms of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary the intended legislation was altered, and the conscientious objections of the English Dissenters were respected. I claim, then, for a body of persons equally respectable and equally conscientious, the same tender consideration. An hon. Member of this House (Mr. Buxton), who was examined before the Committee of the House of Lords, was asked whether he believed that the scruples of the Irish clergy were conscientious scruples. He stated that he had gone to Ireland rather prejudiced in favour of what is called, but miscalled, the National system, but after the inquiries he had instituted he said his conclusion was that the objections to the system were conscientious ones. Another witness, Mr. Stapleton, being asked the same question, replied, that in his judgment clergymen of the Church of England had adopted a very wise and right resolution, and that, in fact, they could hardly conscientiously have adopted any other. Other witnesses who were examined stated that they did not give their adherence to the rules of the system, because if so they felt that they would be departing from the principles of the Reformation. An illustration is sometimes worth more than a great deal of argument, and here is one:—The Rev. Mr. Campbell, one of the witnesses, was asked his opinion on the subject, and he mentioned that in his school on a certain occasion he rebuked a child who had committed a theft, and he gave admonition and instruction suitable to the occasion. But, he said, had his school been under the National system, he could not have given the instruction then, because it was not the hour in which to give it. This gentleman objected to being bound by the law to keep his mouth closed for any portion of the day; he would not allow himself to be prevented from imparting religious instruction in obedience to the command “in season and out of season.” On a former occasion I stated on the authority of the Bishop of Ossory that a clergyman who referred to one of the Commandments in the school was corrected by the schoolmaster, who said he had no right to remark on the Commandments of God, except at particular hours. This question was considered by the Bishops of the Church, and I can answer for it that in their celebrated manifesto they spoke not only the sense of the Episcopate, but that of four-fifths of the clergy of the Reformed Church. The House may remember that a petition was presented to the House of Lords by the Archbishop of Canterbury, signed by 4,514 of the parochial clergy of England, in which they stated that in their opinion the clergy of the Reformed Church in Ireland discharged their duty in resting on the Scriptures as a part of education, and further that they only acted up to the letter and the spirit of their ordination vows. Now, this is not a question of whether the Irish Secretary is of a different opinion. He would, perhaps, recommend them to adopt the advice of our sarcastic and incomparable Dean Swift, who, in pointing out to the clergy of his time how to rise, observed that a man's conscience was of no manner of use unless it stretched with the occasion. The conscientious clergy of Ireland will not support the National system, and, although a deanery or a bishopric might be the reward of their adherence, yet the highest reward which Ministries can bestow has made not the slightest impression on the bulk of the working clergy of Ireland. Such as they have been they are, and such as they are they will continue to be. Every one will admit that the rules of such a system ought to be few, simple, intelligible, and just; but, on the contrary, all the witnesses whose evidence fill the two large volumes now on the table of the House admit that they are evasive, lax, unintelligible—some say unintelligible—liable to be interpreted in every way, in order if possible to meet every case, and to be fixed by no principle whatever. At one time, when the National Board are asked whether religious education can be given in the schools, they reply "Oh yes!" At another time they say, "Not at all; no allusion must be made to religion, or to morality if blended with religion, from ten till three, but before or after school, if you can catch a lad"—and he can't be much like an Irish lad if you do catch him at such a time—"you may talk to him then of religion and morality." The other day a curious correspondence appeared between the Rev. Canon Dalton and the National Board. The Rev. Mr. Dalton wrote the following letter to the Board :—

"For seven years I have had the charge of the parish of Kilbryan, diocese of Elphin, as vicar.

"The gross tithe amounted, per annum, to £14. Lately the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland were enabled to grant a slight augmentation, which raised the annual income of that vicarage to the net value of £70 a year.

"I have maintained a school in that parish. The struggle to pay a teacher, supply requisites, and repair the school-house with so small an income, and the scant aid which the Diocesan Church Education Society could give, may well be imagined.

"The re-opening of the education question by The Daily Express, especially the statement of the editor in this day's paper, induces me to apply at once to the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland for decisive information.

"Will you, then, favour me with a distinct and direct reply to my query on one point on which I really cannot form a clear conclusion from the 'Rules, &c.,' as now propounded in The Daily Express.

"It is simply this :—

"If I place this school in connection with the Board as a non-vested school, may I make use of any reference, remark, observation, elucidation, example, enforcement, precept, quotation, rebuke, or comment out of the Holy Scriptures during the existence of the school in its integrity in 'school hours.'

"In plain terms, may I, then, as patron of that school, walk into my school-room at any time during school instruction, and, if I deem it needful, use the Word of God, the Holy Scripture, in any manner ancillary to the subject-lesson at the time being taught?

"I earnestly beg a clear, candid reply, whether I may or may not take up one of the school Bibles, or my pocket Bible, quote from it, and thus refer to it, and make use of it, unfettered by conditions; or, if not, by what conditions binding my free use of it, as a minister of the Gospel—the 'Word of the Lord which endureth for ever.'"

In reply to that letter, Mr. Dalton received the following reply from the Secretaries :—

"We have laid before the Commissioners of National Education your letter of the 11th ultimo, in which you request a distinct and direct answer to your query on one point—namely :—

"If I place this school in connection with the Board as a non-vested school, may I make use of any reference, remark, observation, elucidation, example, enforcement, precept, quotation, rebuke, or comment out of the Holy Scriptures during the existence of the school in its integrity in 'school hours?'

"In reply, we are directed to state that the Commissioners have found it necessary to decline answering questions of a hypothetical nature regarding the rules, but that they will always be ready to afford full explanation of the principles and rules of the National system, should a difficulty arise in their application in the case of any particular National school.

"We are also directed to forward to you a copy of the rules and regulations of the National Board, and to call attention to the fourth section of part the first, containing the regulations respecting religious instruction.

"We are further to observe that there are various National schools in Dublin, and its vicinity, open to you as a visitor, in which the Commissioners' rules will be found practically exemplified.

"Should you, on consideration, resolve to place the school to which you allude in your letter in connection with the National Board, we shall be happy to send you the forms of application, with the necessary instructions for filling them up, &c."

The writer of that letter is somewhat skilled, I think, in the science of evasion, for certainly the question put to him is a very plain and distinct one, and his answer is no answer at all. Mr. Dalton then wrote to the Secretaries as follows:—

"Sir,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, in reply to mine of the 11th ultimo, enclosing a copy of the rules, &c., and calling my 'attention to the fourth section of part first, containing the regulations respecting religious instruction.'

"I have carefully read the same, and my interpretation of them is, that if I subscribe these rules I consider that I could not honestly make any use of the Holy Scriptures, under any circumstances, while all the school is in attendance during school hours.

"Indeed I am informed, upon excellent authority, that this is the interpretation put upon these rules by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland themselves.

"If I am correct in this my interpretation, I cannot place the school referred to in connection with the Board. Should I not be correct in this interpretation, I shall thank you to forward to me the 'terms of application,' &c., to fill up.

"In case I do not hear from you I shall take it that this interpretation of these rules is the correct one."

The Secretaries replied thus:—

"Sir,—Having laid before the Commissioners of National Education your letter of the 3rd inst., we are directed to inform you in reply, that the use of the Holy Scriptures during the hours of secular instruction, when children of the different denominations attending the school are required to be present, is incompatible with the rules of the Board of National Education, and that religious instruction can take place only at the times and under the conditions laid down in those rules."

Now, it is impossible for a body of clergy who conscientiously believed that they ought to instruct their children out of the Scriptures, to give their adherence to such a system which acts on the principle contained in this correspondence. It is said that the clergy of this country are not so unreasonable, and would feel no difficulty in comprehending the rules. Now, I have shown that correspondence to a friend of mine, well known as a learned man, Mr. Girdlestone, the rector of Stourbridge, and a Fellow of the University of Oxford, and I asked him to say without any prejudice or leaning in favour of the Church or clergy of Ireland, what he, as a gentleman, himself engaged in the work of education, thought of these rules laid down by the Irish Education Board? The rev. gentleman replied as follows:—

Mr. Whiteside

"You ask me what I think of the rule laid down by your Irish Education Board, as recently stated in the letter of the Secretaries to the Rev. George Dalton (February 20). I have no hesitation in replying that no amount of Government aid would induce me to comply with any such condition, however great the difficulty of finding funds to maintain efficient schools in this populous parish. In debarring the schools, of which I am manager (above 600 children in all), from the free use of the Bible in school hours, not only should I deprive them of the only infallible text-book in moral and religious training, but I should do violence at once to my own conscientious convictions, and to those of my parishioners in general. The subscribers to the schools, the parents of the children—nay, the very scholars themselves—would be apt to think meanly of a compromise which, for money's sake, or even for peace sake, would put a ban upon the Scriptures, and tie the tongue of the teacher from so much as, even in school time, quoting the Word of God as an authority in faith or practice. And in thinking meanly of such a compromise, they would cease to respect their pastor if a party to it. Indeed, unless my standard of morality were lower than theirs, I should, in such a case, despise myself."

That letter contains a representation of the convictions of the great bulk of the parochial clergy of Ireland. It has been said that the rules are not what they have been represented to be, but even Mr. Cross, the Secretary to the Commissioners, stated to the House of Lords that the rules were vague and difficult of interpretation, constantly leading to conflicting judgments, and he recommended that their Lordships should prepare or suggest a mode of preparing a code to make the matter clear and certain.

Let me now draw the attention of the House to what was stated by one or two witnesses about these rules. Mr. O'Hagan was asked whether he understood these rules; and he replied that he thought there ought to be some fixed principles laid down for the guidance of the Commissioners. At present the National system was without a fixed system; with a central school that was a shifting model? Mr. Stapleton was asked the same question, and he said he could not say that he did understand the rules. He had tried, but found it was an impossible task to make himself master of them. He understood a few of the most important, but only a few. The right hon. Gentleman may say that such is not the opinion of the inspectors and the paid officials; but I find that Mr. Macready, the head inspector, and therefore one who it is natural to suppose would comprehend them, if comprehension be possible, states that there are rules which admit of some latitude of interpretation, and about which there are sometimes difficulties. There is a rule as to religious instruction, as to what parties shall be present, and circumstances which may render their attendance proper, and the wording of that rule sometimes gives rise to misunderstanding, and it is difficult to say when it is observed, and when it is not. The Board laid down a rule, and said that they would consider it violated if any influence, either direct or indirect, were exercised over a child to induce him to remain during the period of religious instruction. There arose a controversy as to what was indirect influence. The Roman Catholic clergy not unnaturally said that you must not give any religious education in a school where there were any Roman Catholic children, because, if you put them out, the exclusion was a sort of indirect compulsion. I may be told that lawyers may understand the rules. Now, there is Master Murphy, a friend of my own, a very able gentleman, one of the Commissioners, and he says:—

“Every day, I may say, we are pressed to violate some rule or other, or to explain or interpret a rule. If the rules were made clear and plain, and it were understood that we could not modify or relax them, it would be simply necessary in such cases to call attention to the particular rule.”

In addition to these witnesses I may quote the Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Whately, who is one of the competent judges of the meaning of words. He had a dispute with the other Commissioners as to the meaning of the rule under which he said certain books, the Evidences of Christianity, and Lessons on the Subject of Christianity, might be made part of the combined religious education. A majority of the Board held another view, and were of opinion that, if any one child out of 500 objected, the books must be put aside. “That,” said the Archbishop, “is not the interpretation upon which you have been acting for many years.” There was a long correspondence, debate, and argument, and the books were got rid of, but the Archbishop, feeling that faith had been broken with the public, communicated his opinion to the Lord Lieutenant, and getting no redress in that quarter he withdrew from the Board, an example which was followed by several of the gentlemen. I submit, upon the evidence I have quoted, that the rules are in a condition which makes it impossible to administer satisfactorily this system.

I admit there is a question, when you talk about education which must be dreaded, and although you may attempt year after year to evade it, must at last be decided by this House. That question is, can you have education without any religion? There are few men who are more clear in their views than the Archbishop of Dublin, and he says in his own forcible style:—

“We might have an anti-Christian system; we might go against Mahomedanism, Hindooism, and against Christianity altogether; we might try instruction out of ‘Æsop’s Fables.’ But one thing is clear, that Education without religion is impossible. Because, supposing a boy were to ask his teacher whether Jupiter was a real god, or was there any other God, or to tell him who was the true God to worship, what would be the result? Therefore it is absurd to suppose that ever education can exist apart from religion.”

The Archbishop was the first man to support the Board; he stayed with it as long as he could conscientiously, and then when it departed from its principles he left it. There are some things about it which I do understand. I understand they have three or four great fundamental rules. The first is that united education is to be regarded. When I look to the evidence I find that nothing can inspire the Commissioners with more alarm than an application from persons who differ in religion to establish a school. There happen to be about thirty schools out of 5,400 which are managed by patrons of opposite opinions, and they give more trouble than 3,000 other schools. The witnesses say you cannot get the priest and the parson to agree, and that fact is to the credit of both, because, if both are sincere and conscientious, they of course take opposite views. Now, one of the rules is, that every school under the national system shall be open to inspection, and when Mr. Stapleton visited Ireland he went to a convent school with that object. On his presenting himself at the gate somebody came and, opening a little wicket, asked him what he wanted? “To inspect your schools” was the reply. “Do you mean the Roman Catholic school?" "Yes."—Then I must tell you that we never admit anybody to inspect it without a letter from the Roman Catholic clergyman." "But," said Mr. Stapleton, "I was under the impression that all the schools under the National system were open to inspection." "Well, then," was the answer, "if you come back in three-quarters of an hour you will be let in." Mr. Stapleton, however, thought it better to decline the offer, conceiving that in three-quarters of an hour any little arrangements that might be thought expedient could be made, and walked away.

I would now beg to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman opposite to the fact that when the National system of education was originally instituted it was not intended that it should apply to the parochial schools of the Church of England at all. The attention of the Chief Commissioner, Mr. M'Donnell, than whom there could be no better authority on the subject, was drawn to this point, and he was asked what he thought of the passage in the Report of the Commissioners of 1812, from which it appeared that the parochial schools were regarded as institutions which were to be permitted to exist as they stood, save so far as related to the improvement of the secular education which they administered. Mr. M'Donnell's reply was that, in his opinion, the Commissioners must have meant that the parochial schools should remain very much in the same position as that which the schools of the Church Education Society occupied at the present day, and that the supplementary schools should be looked upon somewhat in the light of the existing schools connected with the National Board. Now, this is a point which appears to me to be of considerable moment in the prosecution of the inquiry in which we are engaged; for, while one of the modes in which justice may be done to Ireland on this question may be to allow the patron of each school to have such religious instruction communicated to the children who attend it as he may deem right, something may be done also in the same direction by leaving the old parish schools attached to the old parish churches to give instruction in the Scriptures to all who enter them, as has been the practice from time immemorial. The Scripture schools, I may add, are attended by 80,000 children, of whom 14,000 are Dissenters, and 8,000 Roman Catholics, the rest being Episcopalians; and I am perfectly ready to admit that the rule is that a portion of the Scriptures should every day be read in those schools without note or comment.

Mr. Whiteside

I now come to consider how the great principle of the National system—that the schools under its operation should be equally open to all classes—is carried out in practice. In dealing with that point it is necessary that I should draw a distinction between vested and non-vested schools, and my argument is, that in the latter the principle which I have mentioned is at an end. So long as the Board kept schools vested in itself or in trustees they were its own property, and it had, perhaps, a right to prescribe the course of education which should be carried out in them, but the moment it established the distinction between vested and non-vested schools the principle of an united National system of education was overthrown. Moreover, it is in evidence on the authority of the secretary to the Board, that when the Presbyterian body gave in their allegiance to that system they did so on the express condition that the distinction which I have mentioned should be observed. His words were—

"This is, perhaps, a suitable opportunity of stating that when the Presbyterian body gave in their adhesion to the National system it was made an express stipulation as to the distinction between vested and non-vested schools. I am persuaded that neither clergymen of the Established Church nor Presbyterians would accept aid from the Board unless on the condition that they should not be required to permit any religious instruction of which they disapproved to be given in the school."

I may further observe that I feel assured very few clergymen of the Established Church, or belonging to the Presbyterian body, would accept aid from the Board on the condition that they should permit any religious instruction to be given in the schools under their superintendence of which they disapproved. The late hon. Member for Newry used to argue in this House with great force and clearness—and in my opinion the argument was never answered—that the moment the Board established non-vested schools it put an end to the National system. I may add that our sturdy friends in the north of Ireland—for whom I have a profound respect—when they saw the rules of the National Board said, "We will never join you on those terms," and sent a deputation to Lord Stanley stating what their own rules prescribed. His answer was that he never could recommend the adoption of rules that were calculated to strike so completely at the principle of his system. Lord Ebrington, however, went over as Lord Lieutenant to Ireland, and took occasion to mediate between the Presbyterian body and the National Board. The Presbyterians were firm, energetic men, wedded to their belief; and when earnest conscientious men are opposed to yielding Commissioners who are depending merely upon rules of lax construction, if they press hard they will squeeze their own terms out of them; and they did so in this case. Then, how can you, after conceding the demands of the Presbyterians, refuse to grant what we ask for? The Presbyterians plainly and boldly stated the objections which they entertained, going, as it seems to me, to the root of the whole principle of the National system. The Synod of Ulster, after much debating, ultimately adopted resolutions declaring that the Ministers and people of that Church, without the necessary concurrence of the ministers or the members of any other Church, should enjoy the right of applying to the Board for aid to their schools. This disposes at once of the fundamental principle of the Board that the application shall proceed jointly from members of different religious persuasions. They further declared that it should be the right of parents to require the patrons to set apart a convenient portion of the study and school-hours for the reading of the Holy Scriptures, and that these should be daily read, but that no compulsion should be resorted to to make children remain during that period. The Presbyterians, moreover, said, "our schools shall begin with prayer, and we will have the catechism taught when we think proper; we will not inflict a penalty for non-attendance at these religious exercises, but we will not undertake that the children whose parents may object to them shall leave the school, nor will we provide a place for them to retire to." The result has been, and I rejoice at it, that the children do remain in school to hear the Scriptures read; naturally, in a moist climate they do not like to go out; they have nowhere to retire to, and therefore they stay where they are. As to the rules of the National Board, they no more put them up in Presbyterian schools than they do the rules of the Divan. Dr. Cooke, in his own racy style, denies that they are bound to put up "a show-board" signifying that religious instruction is about to commence, that order having been issued years after the arrangement with the Presbyterians was made, and he states that "he would not put up a showboard for all the Archbishops and Lords that compose the National Board." You have no right, he maintains, to warn children off the premises when the word of God is about to be read. Yet, every Roman Catholic or Protestant clergyman who may join the Board is obliged to define the period of religious instruction by a notice publicly hung up in the school. What is the use of asserting, contrary to the fact and to the evidence, that this is a system of mixed education? Dr. Henry, in his evidence, says the present system is a loose one, which leads to abuses, and he distinctly states that he should prefer a system which should allow religious education to be given in accordance with the wishes of the people.

I come now to the Roman Catholic schools, and I will take first the schools of the nuns. Now, Dr. Kiernan states that what reconciled the Roman Catholics to the system was the admission of the nuns' schools into the system of the National Board. The rule of the Board, however, is that schools are to be open to children of all religions, but it is notorious that these schools are entirely exclusive. It is a rule of the Board that there shall be no emblems in the school, and nothing in the outward appearance of the teacher to mark any distinctive religious faith. These rules are openly violated in the nuns' schools. The garb of the nun is a violation of them, the emblems in the school are violations, and the school itself is generally within the walls of a convent. All this, no doubt, is very proper, but still it is in violation of the rules of the Board. I am not asking you to take a penny away from these schools, which the witnesses state are very efficient; for, though I have my feelings as a Protestant, I hope I have some common-sense as a politician. One of the rules of the Board is that all the teachers shall be trained at your central establishment, but of course the ladies who teach at these schools are not trained there. Another rule is that the teacher shall be paid by an annual salary according to proficiency; that, of course, cannot be carried out in the nuns' school, and a new rule, or rather an exception, has been agreed on with regard to them, and the payment is regulated according to the number of pupils at each school. These are all infractions of the rules of your Board, and are in direct violation of the principle of the National system. The object of paying the teachers is, that the teachers should be under the control of the Board. There are, however, no teachers under the control of the Board in these schools. The nuns walk into the school-room in the middle of the day, they find on the table all kinds of books—books which the rules of the Board exclude—and they use the books in teaching the children. If I am asked whether I consider they are right in doing this, I must answer that I think these ladies are quite right. They are acting according to their vows, under the direction of their superior; they are fulfilling the objects of their corporate existence, and they are quite right in paying no more attention to your rules than to the rules of the Grand Turk. In the monks' schools these rules are still more openly violated. There is a clause in the Emancipation Act with regard to these monks, the object of which the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Secretary for Ireland, will probably understand much better than I, as he is the executor of the eminent person who proposed it. I suppose its object was that, while the parochial clergy got a good education, the "regulars" should be got rid of out of the country altogether. Theoretically, therefore, they have no right to be there, though I do not think they have much to fear practically. The rule of the Board, however, is in accordance with the statute law; and it says that "no clergyman of any denomination, and no members of any religious order, can be recognized as teachers of a National school." But it is notorious that, while clergymen of the Established Church are excluded, monks, who have taken the vows of a religious order, are openly employed in teaching these schools. From what I have said it is apparent that the cases of the Presbyterians, the nuns and the monks make it impossible to regard this as a united National system of education, and I should like to hear an explanation from the right hon. Gentleman opposite.

Parental authority is said to be the fundamental rule of your system; but that principle is respected when it excludes the Scriptures, and is set aside when the Scriptures are included. I will refer the House to the great model school in Gardiner Street, within fifty yards of which is the school of Archdeacon Gregg, and within a few more yards another school. The model school contains about 800 scholars; but the parents of 400 children send them on Sundays to the school of the Archdeacon, where the Scriptures are taught, and there are 250 scholars on week days in the same school. One single minister of my church has 400 children sent by their parents to his school, where they receive a secular education and hear the Scriptures also; and yet it is said that in the National schools we must succumb and conform to the opinions of those parents who wish to exclude the Scriptures, but that we must not attend to the opinions of those parents who are desirous of including the Scriptures in the course of education. How is this to be answered, according to your theory of yielding to parental authority? My case is this, that you should provide for the Roman Catholics fully, fairly, and freely, but that you should not press the clergy of the Reformed faith to proceed on principles which are odious to their faith and repugnant to their consciences. I know that the right hon. Gentleman may say that this reasoning is all very well in the case where the Protestants had schools, and the priests had schools too; but what is to be done in places where there is only one school? My own opinion is that every school should be open to every child, but upon the condition I have indicated.

Mr. Whiteside

Let the House look at the absurd condition in which the schools are placed in regard to books. The Evidences of Christianity were passed by Archbishop Murray, and the book was received and read; but it was afterwards rejected, so that you bind people to the system of reading a particular book, though the system may be changed the next day. What, however, puts an end to all idea of this being a united system of education are the Statutes of Thurles. Mr. Cross, the Secretary to the Board, said he had read those statutes with very great pain—and, indeed, the truth is, that the statutes pronounced against the system formally and ecclesiastically, and that decision has been confirmed by the opinion of the Pope and of the Papal legate. Archbishop Cullen, in his Pastoral, states the opinion of the Church in these terms:—

"As, therefore, the doctrines and practices of the Catholic Church must be continually repeated and inculcated in order to make them productive of good fruit, you will easily perceive, dearly beloved, that your children cannot be properly educated under any system from which religion

excluded, or by persons professing opinions hostile to the teaching of our holy Church. Hence, mixed education, which unites in the one school teachers and pupils of every creed, and professes to teach the religious doctrines of no Church, must be looked on as unfit for Catholics, and calculated to promote scepticism and infidelity; and you cannot with safety send your children to schools or colleges where the teaching is Protestant, and where the masters, oftentimes without knowing what they are doing, imbue the minds of their pupils with most fatal errors on religious subjects.

"There is evident danger that Catholics, who in their youth have received this sort of mixed instruction—neither Catholic nor Protestant—or who have been brought up in Protestant Colleges or Universities, will frequently, in after life, betray the grossest ignorance of Catholic discipline, broach opinions contrary to Catholic doctrine, and scandalize the faithful by their want of respect for their holy Church. Protestant or infidel teaching cannot produce any other effect on the tender mind of Catholic youth. It may, indeed, be said that mixed education in Protestant Colleges and Universities will occasionally bring with it great temporal advantages; but recollect the words of our Divine Redeemer:—'What doth it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul? Or what exchange shall a man give for his soul?'—(Matt. xvi., 16.)"

That opinion is authoritative, and, I believe, sincere. That being so, I may be asked how could any schools patronized by Roman Catholics possibly have been put under the Board since? There are nearly 3,000 schools of which the priests are the patrons. The priest is subject to the Bishop, and the Bishop to the Legate, who is the Vice Pope, and subject to the Pope. The Statutes of Thurles now bind the Pope, the Legate, the Bishops, and the priests, and the priests must carry out the principle of the statutes, which is to put an end to mixed education. The evidence shows that wherever the patron is Roman Catholic the religion is exclusively Roman Catholic; and wherever the patron is Protestant the religion is Protestant. And all I say is that, under the Statutes of Thurles, it is impossible for any Roman Catholic priest to allow mixed education to exist if he can prevent it. It is a vain thing to proceed in the course you are pursuing. The wise and manly course is to do one of two things—either to grant the same practical exception which is allowed to Presbyterian schools, nuns' schools, and monks' schools, to the schools of parish ministers, or else to establish the broad principle that the State will give a good secular education under inspection, and by masters trained and qualified for the duties, and not interfere with the religious education which the patron may think fit to instil. I hold that it is impossible, after the Statutes of Thurles, to carry on mixed education in Ireland.

A meeting of Protestants—at which I was present—recently addressed a letter to the Government, in which their views are temperately stated. The answer to that letter was that no concession could be made with reference to their conscientious objections; and therefore it is for the House now to say whether the decision of the right hon. Gentleman can be justified or not. If this Motion be carried, and the clergy of the Established Church be one and all induced to join the Board, your secular education will be carefully, sincerely, and usefully carried out in 1,600 or 1,700 schools, and you will put an end to disputes and dissensions on this subject in Ireland. If any one could have carried his point it was the Primate. But a great meeting was convened, a meeting of the laity. They held by their original opinions—namely, that religious instruction, the Bible was that by which they should abide; they separated, and they were more resolute now than they were before that letter was written. It comes, then, simply to this—a great principle is at stake. Let each patron carry out his own system of religious instruction while adopting your secular system. Roman Catholics ought not to object to this at our request, for they know that their Protestant brethren are sincere. There are no penal laws now on the Statute Book; if there be any penal law which is objectionable to them I abjure it; but they must be prepared to encounter discussion, the light of knowledge, and of truth. They must be prepared for the full current of education, and I have no fears of the result. I believe, as it has been said, that truth is strong, next to the Almighty. She requires no policies nor stratagems to make her victorious. These are the shafts that error uses against her power, therefore I am satisfied, if we can have free access to truth, and a right to spread the truth. But you must be mindful of this—and I say it in no spirit of bigotry—the question is whether the Protestants as a nation are to be allowed to read the Bible. Remember what was effected for you by those who restored the Bible to you. From that time to the present the unfettered use of the Scriptures has made you free, wise, religious, and happy. You send your missionaries to every clime to bring home the knowledge of the truth to those who have it not, and by what right do you then turn round upon those who desire to read the Scriptures in the parish schools, and say we will embarrass, annoy, and vex you, not for the purpose of conciliating Roman Catholics, but for the purpose of establishing some grand principle of centralizing authority, hoping thereby to control the feelings and affections of the human mind, which is an impossibility? While I am willing to make every concession which is reasonable and just to the Roman Catholics of Ireland, I will not consent, on the part of my own Church and the laity, of which I am a member, and whose opinions I speak, to give up that which is our birthright, and I commend the cause which I have but too feebly advocated, to the mind of every true Protestant in this House and country.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, thirty years ago this House withdrew its support from the system of education then followed in Ireland in consequence of the total failure of the efforts which had been made in pursuance of repeated inquiries instituted under the highest auspices and prosecuted with all the power and influence of the British Government. During the thirty years which have since elapsed there has grown up in Ireland a system which, as scarcely any one can be found to deny, has conferred upon the whole people of the country the greatest benefits that ever were bestowed by any system upon any country in the world. I say scarcely any one can be found to deny this, because, while many criticise the details of the system, while one objects to this provision, and another to that, yet the universal testimony of fact and of opinion coincides in this—that the most signal blessings have been conferred on Ireland by the system of education which has now been in successful operation for thirty years. The generation which has grown up under this system is different from any which has preceded it in the power it exercises for compassing its own material prosperity, and that of the country; but that is the least of its benefits, including, as they do, every social, every moral, every religious advantage which the population of a country can enjoy.

Let me proceed, with the patience of the House, to trace out in some detail the progress of the system which has thus grown up. In 1806 there was a memorable Commission, which reported in 1812, and which laid down those broad principles of liberal education for Ireland which from that period to the present Parliament has been endeavouring to establish and promote. After the experience of twelve years the result of the first experiment proved unsatisfactory, and again a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the cause of its failure. That Commission reported in 1826, and a Committee of this House recommended in 1828 the adoption of the principles it enunciated. That recommendation was again confirmed by another Committee in 1830, and in 1831 issued that memorable letter with which the name of the Earl of Derby will be for ever honourably associated, and which constitutes the charter and foundation of the system of education in Ireland. During the time which has since elapsed the progress of that system has been as follows:—In 1833 there were 789 schools and 107,000 pupils; in 1843, ten years afterwards, the number rose to 2,912 schools and 355,000 pupils; and in 1853 to 5,023 schools and 550,000 pupils. Since 1853 we have been told it was impossible that the system could flourish and progress after the decree issued by the Synod of Thurles. But has it withered from that or any other cause? In the last Report of the Commission, at this time at which I speak, the number of schools in Ireland under the system of national education is 5,496; and the number of pupils, 570,000. But it may be said that the system is partial in its operation, that it is not fully extended through the country, that it showers its benefits here, while it withholds them there. Let us see, then, what is the distribution of the system through the four provinces of Ireland—provinces differing widely from one another in many of those respects which constitute the main features of a question of this kind. In Ulster there are now 189,000 pupils, in Leinster 142,000, in Munster 154,000, in Connaught 84,000. This shows, I think, that the benefits of the system are equally and generally distributed throughout the country. But any one who has listened to the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) will not fail to conclude that in another respect at least the system is partial in its operation, and withholds its benefits from various classes of the community. Let us look at the facts of the case. If we take the pupils according to their religion, we find that the pupils belonging to the Church of the great majority of the people, the Church of those whose circumstances render it most necessary that the State should be solicitous for their benefit and carry education to their door—the pupils of that denomination numbered in the year just expired no fewer than 478,000. The pupils connected with the Established Church were 29,000, with the Presbyterian Church 59,000, and with other Dissenting bodies 2,500. The evidence contained in the blue-books of 1853, from which the right hon. Gentleman quoted, is in some degree answered by the fact that conspicuous as were the growth and progress of the system before that time there has been nothing since which at all tends to discourage the confident expectations of those who advocated and sustained it. Compared with that period the increase in the number of Roman Catholic pupils has been 54,000; the increase in the Presbyterian pupils 19,000; and in the pupils of the Established Church 4,400. Well, I say, when you appeal from argument to fact, when I am told that this system is alien from the feelings of the nation, I answer by showing that there has been such a continuous history of progress, such a gradual advance in the popular acceptance and influence of the system, as is certainly unexampled in our records, or, I believe, in the records of any other country.

Mr. Whiteside

But it will be said, “You can exhibit an increase in regard to other churches, but there has been a remarkable falling off in regard to the Established Church.” I will examine that part of the case. What has been the progress of the system in respect to that body in behalf of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman made his animated appeal? From 1852 to the close of last year the increase of Protestant pupils under the national system, has been from 67,000 to 91,000, being an increase of 36 per cent and of pupils belonging to the Established Church, from 24,684 to 29,105 being an increase of over 17 per cent. In the meantime the Church Education Society, which in 1854 had a total of 95,000, has now only a total of 78,000; while of Established Church pupils they had, in 1854, 60,000, and five years afterwards only 52,000. Then, if you take another test,—one of the most important and conclusive to which the popular acceptance of any system of education can be subjected—and ask, “Has the whole of this been attained by the expenditure of money generously given by this House, or has there been on the part of those who have enjoyed these advantages a growing desire to contribute to the maintenance of the system?”—in that respect, too, you will find equally remarkable and satisfactory evidence of the growing influence of this system over the popular mind in Ireland. In 1852 the local contributions raised towards the system amounted only to £26,000; whereas in the year just expired they nearly reached £44,000, being an increase of 62 per cent. Then, I say, whatever may be urged by those who criticise one part of the system or raise objections to another, the evidence of fact is clear and irresistible—and I believe that those who endeavour to ascertain for themselves by personal experience what the general feeling of all classes in Ireland is, will arrive at the same results—the evidence is clear and irresistible that it commands the respect and wins the affections of the community which it is destined to serve.

But let us apply still wider and larger tests. Do you know any country in the world the education of which will bear a comparison like the one to which I am about to expose that of Ireland? Taking the whole population of Ireland at 6,000,000, you will find, according to the calculations usually made, that one-fourth of that entire number will consist of young persons between the ages of five and fifteen, or about 1,500,000 of the Irish population. If you take one-half of that number as the bond fide proportion of pupils attending school you will still keep close to the calculations commonly made in such cases. Now, notwithstanding the discouragement this system has had to encounter, not the least of which is the unfortunate opposition it has long experienced from those whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman has declared himself specially to represent, and who have had under their care a number of pupils not far short of, and sometimes even exceeding 100,000, you find that Ireland presents the remarkable fact that you have a population now under education nearly corresponding with that which you would expect by the ordinary calculation to be in attendance at school. Remembering, too, that all this is due to a system established only thirty years ago upon the failure of preceding systems, which for nearly an equal period had been striving with all the power and wisdom of the State to promote national education in Ireland, I think it cannot be—I believe it will not be—denied that it does present, upon the whole, one of the most gratifying instances of success to be found in the history of public instruction in Europe.

But it is said—and the right hon. and learned Gentleman dwelt very earnestly on this part of the case, while the hon. and learned Mover even thought it too manifest to condescend to adduce proof in support of the assertion—it is said “You may have a widely distributed education, but you have totally failed in establishing a mixed system.” Now, is it true that it has failed as a mixed system? In the first place, I differ from the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who thinks you attain no important end if you offer to a people a system of instruction which is in its nature suited for a mixed assembly of pupils,—whether it be actually attended by a mixed assembly or not. For what is an exclusive system, but one in which the tendency of each individualized and particular opinion is to grow and develop in the particular school, whereas in a system like that established in Ireland there is a tendency, by giving the same education, from the same books, to enlarge the general nature of the whole, to expand its principles, and produce a disposition even in pupils who may have been trained in different schools to mix in after life in the business and intercourse of society with greater facilities, greater freedom, and mutual adaptation, and with greater advantage to the public. But the case does not stop there. The system is actually that which it is intended to be, a system of mixed education. Where the population is not mixed of course the attendance at school is not mixed. And as in large parts of Ireland there is no mixture of the population, and as where there is there have been other schools maintained for the express benefit of the minority, who have naturally been attracted to them, of course it is not to be expected that the statistics should exhibit any great and favourable result in respect of mixed education. But if you examine the figures you will find that in Ulster, where the mixture of the population is greatest, 84 per cent of the schools are mixed schools; in Leinster the proportion is 41 per cent; in Munster 34 per cent; and in Connaught 49 per cent. Could anybody, then, looking to all the obstacles with which the system has had to contend, have anticipated a larger measure of success than that which has really been attained? Again, do you think a comparison would be unfavourable to Ireland between the 570,000 pupils educated under the National Board there and the 820,000 last year educated under the Privy Council in this country? Looking to the population and wealth of the two countries, and comparing them with the means and the end to be obtained, can it be said that the result is unfavourable to the system of education in Ireland? What has that system been? The right hon. and learned Gentleman, when we discussed this subject last year, invited me to abstain from drawing hasty conclusions from blue-books. He has not on this occasion entirely observed the advice he gave me, but since he gave me this advice I have endeavoured by personal inquiries, rather than by reference to a blue-book seven years old—and that is a generation in a system that has only been established thirty years—to ascertain the real state and circumstances of the system now in operation in Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has extracted the answers to a number of inquiries made to witnesses who were subjected to an ingenious and searching cross-examination before a Committee of the other House, which answers appeared to him to furnish the best materials for the case he was endeavouring to establish. But, in examining a system like that under consideration, you must first draw a distinction between those rules which are essential and cardinal, and which cannot be departed from by the managers except by a breach of principle, and those other rules which are merely ancillary in their nature, and which any reasonable man would mould and modify to meet the varying circumstances of the country, and the particular case with which you have to deal.

Mr. Cardwell

The system of national education that has been established in Ireland for thirty years has two cardinal rules—first, that the education given to pupils during ordinary school hours shall be of that—I will not say secular—but of that comprehensive character that it may be offered equally to the pupils of all the Christian Churches into which Ireland is divided. The second rule is, that the patron of any school may give religious instruction in other than school hours according to his own distinctive tenets, provided that no child shall be required to be present at any religious instruction which his parents and friends disapprove. Under great discouragement these principles have been and are still maintained, and when the right hon. and learned Gentleman says that these rules have been infringed for the benefit of the sturdy Presbyterians and in other cases, I must join issue with him, and say that neither in the one case nor the others are these cardinal rules set at nought, either by the managers of the system or by the Government. I wonder, indeed, it did not occur to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that his complaint is an answer to itself, and that the rules that are applied to one are also applied to another. He says that no offer has been made to the Church body of an adaptation of these rules. Certainly no offer was made to the Church of a compromise of these cardinal principles, and no such offer will, I trust, ever be made with the sanction of this House. But in answer to the very friendly memorial of the Church Education Society a plain statement of the rules of the National Education system was returned, with an intimation of the desire felt both by the Government and the Commissioners that the system should, if possible, and without interfering with the integrity of its rules, enjoy the great advantage of the support of the Church Education Society.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman has descended into details of such antiquity, that I cannot attempt to follow him, but at the same time I cannot avoid answering some of the points he has brought forward. He must surely have forgotten that the Presbyterians have now been included in the system for twenty years, and that the greater part of the growth of the system, during which it has comprehended more and more new pupils drawn from the whole population of Ireland, has taken place since the time of which he spoke. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman mean to say that the rules are not binding, and that they are systematically infringed for the benefit of one class of the population in Ireland? If he says that, I must meet him with an express denial of the accuracy of his statement, and I invite him to bring instances before the notice of the Government in order that they may be redressed. He says there is one rule for Presbyterian schools under the Board, and another rule for missionary schools in remote parts of Ireland. Of course there must be one rule for schools in which the managers are bound not to make a proselyte, and in which it is not alleged that they ever made a proselyte, and another rule for schools established for another object in different parts of Ireland, and which are excluded from the aid of the State because they decline to submit to the rules of the Board. So it will be found that, where a school maintains itself with the aid of the Church Education Society, it retains its independence as a missionary school; while the increasing number that seek a connection with the Board derive the great advantages which this House so liberally offers through the Commissioners of Education. It is also charged that the managers in some cases allow these schools to be used as chapels. The rule on which the Government acts in such cases is broad and plain. Any services of a sacramental character are prohibited in the schools, but if ordinary meetings are proposed to be held the inspectors do not inquire into the objects of those meetings. From no quarter has any complaint reached me of any compromise of the rules for the benefit of the Presbyterians. The right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke in terms of just and merited respect of the great value of nuns' schools to the rising population of Ireland, and said it would be a great calamity if anything should prevent the mothers of the future generation from receiving the education thereby given in many parts of Ireland; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman has been told that the rules to which I have referred have been violated in these schools, and that Protestants have declared that they would not intrust their children to nuns' schools. This statement of an unwillingness on the part of Protestant parents to intrust their children to these schools I do not dispute; but it is not that with which we are concerned. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's argument was that, as the rules were violated for the Presbyterian schools so also they were violated for the Roman Catholic schools. On the authority of the resident Commissioner I can state as a fact that in no instance have the Commissioners sanctioned a violation of the rules in the case of these schools. What does the hon. and learned Gentleman who made the Motion say? The right hon. and learned Gentleman complains that the rules of the Board are so slippery and elastic that he cannot describe them, but the hon. and learned Member who opened the debate said that they were of so rigid and Procrustean a character that they cramp the mind and character of Ireland. Both these complaints cannot be well founded, and my opinion is that the truth, as is usually the case, lies between them, and that the Board of National Education pursues a middle course, which, while requiring an adherence to cardinal rules and fixed principles, admits a certain amount of relaxation of minor regulations in order to meet the exigencies and requirements of the time. The right hon. and learned Gentleman asserted that in respect to nuns' schools all rules and principles were abandoned; but in the case of the nunnery at Youghal the hon. and learned Member for that borough (Mr. Butt) stated that when there had been an infringement of the rules in the school connected with it the Commissioners sent down a Protestant inspector, who examined into and reported upon the circumstances. That is a conclusive answer to the charge of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. With regard to the monks I hope to give an explanation which will be satisfactory to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The Commissioners have decided that the rule which prohibits Presbyterian and Roman Catholic clergymen and clergymen of the Church of England from being teachers in schools shall, by parity of reasoning and equality of principle, apply also to monks.

MR. WHITESIDE: When was that decision come to?

MR. CARDWELL: I cannot inform the right hon. and learned Gentleman as to the exact date, but, although most of his information is seven years old, he will allow me to proceed upon that of a more recent date. The Commissioners have decided that although a monk is not necessarily a person in holy orders, he shall be held to be so for the purposes of this system; and, that although those already upon the establishment may be continued in their employments, no more monks shall be received as teachers. The system then is quite as much a system of mixed education as, under the circumstances, you can reasonably expect. And with regard to the quality of the education, I might call into court as a witness the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself who last year, in advocating the claims of the Church Society to a participation in the benefits of the National system, pronounced, in terms of just eulogium, his opinion upon the teachers and books of the National Board.

I now come to the question what is the demand that is made upon the House, what is the practical step that you are called upon to take? The hon. and learned Gentleman who brought forward the Motion called upon you to extend to Ireland the system which he thinks works so well in England. I must remind him that among many differences between the circumstances of the two countries there is this great one—that, while in England the greater portion of the expense of education is paid by local contributors and the smaller portion by the State, in Ireland the reverse is the case, and education there is carried on almost entirely by means of the grant. The right hon. and learned Gentleman insists that the conscience of the giver shall be the rule according to which each gift shall be administered. What is that demand? Is it a demand for denominational education? Why, the Church Education Society very recently published a statement, in which, speaking of denominational education, they said,—

Mr. Cardwell

“There is hardly any measure which the Church Education Society would contemplate with deeper regret than that which would partition off the responsible management of the public funds given for educational purposes to the several denominations of which the people are composed. They are convinced that the result of such a measure would be seriously to retard educational progress, to foment strife and the bitterness of party spirit, and to place the Church of the country in a grievously false position—that of being only one denomination among a number equally recognized by the State.”

That is the opinion of the constituents of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and last year, when I was daily assailed with arguments that what was good for England must be good for Ireland, and ought therefore to be extended to that country, the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who was abroad, nevertheless determined there should be no mistake as to his opinion, and wrote to the Irish newspapers to say that denominational education had in him no champion and no supporter. But if we do not have denominational education, what are we to have? The right hon. and learned Gentleman proposes to break the rule in favour of the Church Education Society, and to give to their schools State support, although the pupils therein are required to receive instruction which Roman Catholic children cannot receive without offence to their consciences. If the rule is broken in favour of the schools of the Church Education Society, can it be maintained with regard to those of any other denomination; and if it is not observed, do you not arrive at that very result which is condemned

both by the right hon. and learned Gentleman and by those whom he represents? The answer of the Government now will be the same as that given by Sir Henry Hardinge in 1834 after the accession to power of a Government which was supposed not to be favourable to this system, that the Imperial policy upon this subject was settled and fixed, and that, although there had been a change of Ministry there would be no change of policy. Again, in 1852, there was a change of Government. Did that change of Government afford to those who desire the overthrow of the National system any consolation or comfort? The right hon. and learned Gentleman said my hon. Friend the Member for Newport (Mr. Buxton), went over to Ireland prejudiced in favour of the system, and, with the candour which becomes an honest inquirer, he returned prejudiced against it. But Ireland was visited in 1852 by a more distinguished man even than my hon. Friend the Member for Newport: I mean the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland under the Government of the Earl of Derby. He went over to Ireland prejudiced against the National system; but he frankly admitted in the House of Lords that he returned convinced of its inestimable benefits, and determined to take no step which should be adverse to it. [Lord NAASS: Hear, hear!] The noble Lord cheers me, and confirms with his high authority the statement I have made. Years rolled on, and there was another change of Government. The voluminous blue-book, to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has made so much reference, was not in the possession of the Government of 1852, but it was in the possession of the Government of 1858. If those long extracts which the right hon. and learned Gentleman read to us tell with such effect against the system of national education in Ireland, why did they fail to make a similar impression in 1858? I wish to be just to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I believe that as far as the personal convictions of the right hon. and learned Gentleman were concerned, those extracts did produce the effect which he describes. It was stated in the debate last year that the Irish Government did propose a modification to the Cabinet of the Earl of Derby; but to the immortal honour of the distinguished nobleman who inaugurated the system, he has not left behind the fatal reminiscence that he was prepared to subvert and overthrow it.

We are now in 1860, and what are the circumstances which in the present year should lead us to destroy the National system? If we have been firm and resolute during so many years of adversity, what is there in the circumstances of 1860 which should dispose us to yield to the pressure of the right hon. and learned Gentleman? The right hon. and learned Gentleman told us last year that, though the sturdy Presbyterians had connected themselves with the National system, yet the Wesleyans and the Churchmen were excluded. Where are the Wesleyans now? Have they not joined the system? Have they not given to it all the sanction which their known adherence to Scriptural education must necessarily convey? Why is it to be argued that rules which are not too rigid to exclude Presbyterians and Wesleyans are yet too rigid for the consciences of those whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman represents? Who in the long years of adversity was the head and heart of the system of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman is the advocate if not the venerable Primate? But on the authority of one who so long and worthily represented the University which the right hon. and learned Gentleman now represents—I mean Mr. Napier—the venerable Primate, in the words of the Bishop of Ossory, has in his recent letter “surrendered the whole principle of the question.” Do not let me be told, therefore, that the rules of the National Board are too rigid to exclude Churchmen when the venerable Primate himself has abandoned all opposition to them. I have said that the Wesleyans have joined us. Has nobody else joined us since the publication of the letter of the Primate? Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman heard of no large proprietors, no men of the first rank and influence in Ireland, who have already placed their schools under the National Board? The Duke of Manchester told me recently that he had placed his schools, or was about to place them, in connection with the Board, and in the short period which has elapsed since the publication of the letter of the Primate no fewer than forty-eight Church schools have applied to be incorporated with the National system, the applications being made in twenty-eight cases by clergymen, and in the rest by laymen. I suspect the right hon. and learned Gentleman will find that his firm phalanx of 1,600 schools will not long continue to fight a battle of which the people of Ireland are opinion is that the truth, as is usually the case, lies between them, and that the Board of National Education pursues a middle course, which, while requiring an adherence to cardinal rules and fixed principles, admits a certain amount of relaxation of minor regulations in order to meet the exigencies and requirements of the time. The right hon. and learned Gentleman asserted that in respect to nuns' schools all rules and principles were abandoned; but in the case of the nunnery at Youghal the hon. and learned Member for that borough (Mr. Butt) stated that when there had been an infringement of the rules in the school connected with it the Commissioners sent down a Protestant inspector, who examined into and reported upon the circumstances. That is a conclusive answer to the charge of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. With regard to the monks I hope to give an explanation which will be satisfactory to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The Commissioners have decided that the rule which prohibits Presbyterian and Roman Catholic clergymen and clergymen of the Church of England from being teachers in schools shall, by parity of reasoning and equality of principle, apply also to monks.

Mr. WHITESIDE: When was that decision come to?

Mr. CARDWELL: I cannot inform the right hon. and learned Gentleman as to the exact date, but, although most of his information is seven years old, he will allow me to proceed upon that of a more recent date. The Commissioners have decided that although a monk is not necessarily a person in holy orders, he shall be held to be so for the purposes of this system; and, that although those already upon the establishment may be continued in their employments, no more monks shall be received as teachers. The system then is quite as much a system of mixed education as, under the circumstances, you can reasonably expect. And with regard to the quality of the education, I might call into court as a witness the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself who last year, in advocating the claims of the Church Society to a participation in the benefits of the National system, pronounced, in terms of just eulogium, his opinion upon the teachers and books of the National Board.

I now come to the question what is the demand that is made upon the House, what is the practical step that you are called upon to take? The hon. and learned Gentleman who brought forward the Motion called upon you to extend to Ireland the system which he thinks works so well in England. I must remind him that among many differences between the circumstances of the two countries there is this great one—that, while in England the greater portion of the expense of education is paid by local contributors and the smaller portion by the State, in Ireland the reverse is the case, and education there is carried on almost entirely by means of the grant. The right hon. and learned Gentleman insists that the conscience of the giver shall be the rule according to which each gift shall be administered. What is that demand? Is it a demand for denominational education? Why, the Church Education Society very recently published a statement, in which, speaking of denominational education, they said,—

Mr. Cardwell

“There is hardly any measure which the Church Education Society would contemplate with deeper regret than that which would partition off the responsible management of the public funds given for educational purposes to the several denominations of which the people are composed. They are convinced that the result of such a measure would be seriously to retard educational progress, to foment strife and the bitterness of party spirit, and to place the Church of the country in a grievously false position—that of being only one denomination among a number equally recognised by the State.”

That is the opinion of the constituents of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and last year, when I was daily assailed with arguments that what was good for England must be good for Ireland, and ought therefore to be extended to that country, the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who was abroad, nevertheless determined there should be no mistake as to his opinion, and wrote to the Irish newspapers to say that denominational education had in him no champion and no supporter. But if we do not have denominational education, what are we to do?

The right hon. and learned Gentleman poses to break the rule

Church Education

their schools

pupils therein

instruction w/cannot rec conscience

vour of t

tion Sor

gard t

and if

at

both by the right hon. and learned Gentleman and by those whom he represents? The answer of the Government now will be the same as that given by Sir Henry Hardinge in 1834 after the accession to power of a Government which was supposed not to be favourable to this system, that the Imperial policy upon this subject was settled and fixed, and that, although there had been a change of Ministry there would be no change of policy. Again, in 1852, there was a change of Government. Did that change of Government afford to those who desire the overthrow of the National system any consolation or comfort? The right hon. and learned Gentleman said my hon. Friend the Member for Newport (Mr. Buxton), went over to Ireland prejudiced in favour of the system, and, with the candour which becomes an honest inquirer, he returned prejudiced against it. But Ireland was visited in 1852 by a more distinguished man even than my hon. Friend the Member for Newport: I mean the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland under the Government of the Earl of Derby. He went over to Ireland prejudiced against the National system; but he frankly admitted in the House of Lords that he returned convinced of its insupportable benefits, and determined to take no step which should be adverse to it. [Lord Nass: Hear, hear.] The noble Lord cheers me, and confirms with his high authority the statement I have made. Years rolled on, and there was another change of Government. The voluntary system

We are now in 1860, and what are the circumstances which in the present year should lead us to destroy the National system? If we have been firm and resolute during so many years of adversity, what is there in the circumstances of 1860 which should dispose us to yield to the pressure of the right hon. and learned Gentleman? The right hon. and learned Gentleman told us last year that, though the sturdy Presbyterians had connected themselves with the National system, yet the Wesleyans and the Churchmen were excluded. Where are the Wesleyans now? Have they not joined the system? Have they not given to it all the sanction which their known adherence to Scriptural education must necessarily convey? Why is it to be argued that rules which are not too rigid to exclude Presbyterians and Wesleyans are yet too rigid for the consciences of those whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman represents? Who in the long years of adversity was the head and heart of the system of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman is the advocate if not the venerable Primates? But on the authority of one who so long and worthily represented the University which the right hon. and learned Gentleman now represents—I mean Mr. Napier—the venerable Primate, in the words of the Bishop of Exeter, has in his recent letter “surrendered the whole principle of the question.” Is not let me be told, therefore, that the rules of the National Board are too high to exclude already weary, but will take refuge in a union which I think is consistent with their conscientious feelings, and tends largely to promote the great cause they have at heart. The silent, but very perceptible, very intelligible, and almost irresistible force of public opinion which was manifested in Ireland in 1859 has also tended to confirm and strengthen to a degree that can scarcely be appreciated the influence of the National system of education in Ireland. To every proposal for breaking down the cardinal principles of that system, to every proposal for establishing denominational education, to every proposal for giving a separate grant to those who insist upon instruction during school hours which is not available for pupils belonging to all Christian Churches, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to reply in the emphatic words used by Sir Robert Peel in 1845:—

"I cannot, of course, question the perfect right of those who conscientiously dissent from a certain plan of public education to withhold their countenance from it, and establish another more in conformity with their own principles. But it is my duty to inform you that to that other plan so established Her Majesty's Government cannot lend their sanction. . . . It would soon be discovered that we must take our choice between the upholding and encouraging of a single system of instruction, founded on the principles of that which is now receiving the sanction of Government, and the granting of public aid to at least three different societies in Ireland—by each of which secular instruction should be combined with religious instruction in the particular doctrine of each religion; one in connection with the Established Church, another with the Presbyterian, and another with the Roman Catholic religion. In such a case all hope of mixed education must be relinquished, and a line of demarcation would be drawn between the children of different religious persuasions, more marked than has hitherto existed at any period. Her Majesty's Government deprecate this result as a great public evil."

Can you imagine a public evil more calculated to inflict permanent injury upon Ireland? What is the great aim and object of Her Majesty's Government and indeed of every one who labours for the good of Ireland? Not to diminish the sincere convictions of the members of any Church, but to secure that, while the private convictions of the Members of all Churches are allowed free play, in the intercourse of practical life, of business, of society, of pleasure, in duties public and in duties private, all classes of the community shall live together as one united people. Who can tell the effect, not merely upon the education, but upon the peace and prospérité of Ireland, which has been produced by the principles of Government which were inaugurated thirty years ago? If it be true, as Sir James Mackintosh and other writers tell us, that the great power of the British people is due to the freedom of their institutions, how much of that great development we have witnessed in Ireland during the last thirty years is due to the improved Government of which the national system of education has been often and truly called the greatest part?

Mr. Cardwell

Let me ask a question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Upon what grounds is it that he of all persons comes forward to oppose the existing system of education? He filled with honour to himself the office of Attorney General for Ireland under the Government of the Earl of Derby. Is it in that capacity that he seeks to subvert a system with which the name of the Earl of Derby will be for ever associated? Does he make the attempt as the representative of the Church Education Society in Ireland? I find the very same men who as private individuals or dignitaries of the Church cannot reconcile it to their consciences to adopt the principles of the National Board, yet, as members of the Clare Street Board, are not only adopting the identical rules, but forcing them on remonstrant clergymen. Then, I ask, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman make the attempt as the representative of Trinity College? If so, has he ever read the pamphlets and letters in the newspapers by tutors and eminent members of the College, stating that the principle of the National Board has been for more than half a century the principle of Trinity College itself? This morning I received a pamphlet which the late Member for Dublin University, the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland, was kind enough to send me, and in it there is the following passage:—

"The case of Trinity College, though not at all parallel in degree, yet, as to this objection of complicity, seems to be decisive. After the Act of 1793 and the King's letter of 1794, the Board was bound to remove every impediment which stood in the way of a Roman Catholic taking his degree in Arts, and for this purpose to dispense in his favour with every rule of the system as to that part of the course of education in which it would be against his conscience to participate."

And in another passage it is stated:—

"Although there is no express rule subscribed, there is, under the statute, the Royal letter, and the system of the University, a restriction as morally binding upon every tutor as if it were set forth in the words of the rule of the National Board, and subscribed under hand and seal."

I am glad to have on my side the Primate of Ireland and the late Lord Chancellor. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite has not paid his learned Friend, the late Chancellor of Ireland, the compliment of reading his pamphlet, because he said that so far was this reservation about interfering with religious instruction carried, that if a gentleman went into a school, he must not remonstrate with a child whom he found stealing, lest, by referring to the Eighth Commandment, he should infringe the rule of the Board. The House will not expect me to enter into such an argument, but in the Appendix to Mr. Napier's pamphlet, the right hon. and learned Gentleman will find his observation answered. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier) says that he has taken pains to ascertain how far religious instruction is included by the rules of the National Board. This is the case with respect to that matter—

"The school may be opened with prayer; there may be a daily Bible class for all children whose parents consent that they should attend, and none need be deprived of a careful daily instruction in the Word of God, except those whose parents object."

With respect to religious instruction in the schools, it is supposed by many that the education is wholly of a non-religious character; but it is a great mistake to suppose that to be the case even in the schools which most completely reflect the system of the Board. I have before me a paper which has been furnished to me by the Bishop of Derry relative to the books provided by the National Board, and he says they are the best books to be found in any of the Irish schools. I am told that the books sanctioned by the Board are read in all the 5,500 schools connected with this system of education, and never was there a time when there was less of irreligious feeling among the growing youth of Ireland than at present; while not a single instance of proselytism in these schools during the last twenty years is alleged. Being desirous to learn what was going on under this system of education by personal experience rather than from books, I followed the advice of the right hon. and learned Member and attended, wholly unexpectedly, the examination at the model school in Belfast. Dr. Willock and Mr. Anderson were examining the Church of England children, under the superintendence of the Bishop. All I will say with respect to the examination is this, that if the examination had been at Oxford, I might have supposed that the book of examination was the Horæ Paulinæ. The Bishop was educated at Eton. I had a friend with me who had received his education at Rugby, I myself was educated at Winchester, and on comparing notes the observation we made was, "Well, this may be an education from which religion is excluded, but we cannot remember that at a much more mature age, when we were at the great public schools of England, we could have passed so stiff an examination in the "Horæ Paulinæ," as these little children in the Belfast school were passing under the examination of Dr. Willock and Mr. Anderson. Proceeding into another room, we saw the Roman Catholic pupils and the Presbyterian pupils, who I believe are in a majority, in all 1,000, guided by a Roman Catholic master, engaged in singing hymns together, exhibiting the most gratifying evidence of the merits of the mixed system, as the other case did of the separate system. After this I can well believe that the challenge of Dr. Willock would be verified, and that if those whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman represents will produce children from the Church Education schools to compete in Scriptural education with children educated by the National Board, the latter will not be afraid to sustain such a competition and abide by the comparison.

Sir, the step which the House is now called upon to take is one of the most important, and, if taken, it would, in my opinion, be of the most destructive character. But I believe that as the House of Commons have been firm and steadfast in their adherence to the system of National education in times of difficulty, they will not fail to support it in the days of its comparative success. I believe that they will not allow its leading rules to be compromised. Though not at all unconscious that we have still great difficulties to contend with, I maintain that the system has proved successful in point of numbers and in point of results; that it has conferred the greatest benefits upon Ireland, morally, socially, and politically, as well as materially; that it has done more to raise the character of Ireland than any other institution or than any other system, and that it has, therefore, been of the greatest advantage, not to Ireland only, but also to this country. When the Primate has given his concurrence to this system, when the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland has become an advocate for it, when in the north of Ireland public opinion has been exhibited so markedly in its favour, and when throughout the whole country there exists, though not unanimously, the same irresistible feeling, I confidently believe that, while due concession may be made to reasonable objections and just suggestions, the cardinal principles of the system, which have been steadily upheld by successive Governments and by successive Parliaments, this House will not permit to be infringed.

MR. LEFROY said, he felt it his duty to express, as shortly and as clearly as he could, the opinions of those with whom, together with his right hon. and learned Friend below him (Mr. Whiteside), he fully concurred on this question. He regretted that the subject had not been discussed at an earlier period of the Session, and still more that it should then be discussed under the pressure of other equally important business. He had never shrunk to express his regret for the course pursued by the National Board. He had felt that it could not be satisfactory to Ireland, and still less satisfactory to the ministers of the Established Church in Ireland, whose views he particularly represented on this occasion. He had never, since he had the honour of a seat in that House, hesitated to express that opinion; nor had he, on the other hand, hesitated to say that the system recommended by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Butt) would equally fail to give satisfaction. The ministers of the Established Church asked for no teaching but that which might be properly, and should be, taught in a Christian nation. They asked to have the Scriptures read in their schools, and they properly declined to take part in those schools where the Scriptures were practically excluded. If nuns' schools, if the schools of Presbyterians, if the schools of Wesleyans, were supported by National grants, surely the same advantage ought to be conceded to the Church of England. He therefore regretted that the Government had not taken steps to extend the National system in a manner which would enable all to partake in it, or that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland could hold out no hope that such a modification in the system would be adopted.

MR. HENNESSY moved the adjourn-

Mr. Cardwell

ment of the debate. There were many hon. Gentlemen who wished to speak, and as there was another important Motion on the paper he thought it was not right that the whole night should be occupied by Irish Members.

THE O'DONOGHUE seconded the Motion.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he thought the hon. Member could hardly be serious in moving the adjournment. Here was a Member of an Irish county, who was constantly making complaints that Irish business was not properly carried on, when a debate upon a most important Irish question had commenced in good earnest, absolutely moving its adjournment. He (Mr. B. Osborne) had considerable interest in this question, perhaps more than the hon. Gentleman, as he contributed to more schools. He had come down to hear the debate, and he thought the people of Ireland and the constituents of the hon. Gentleman could hardly feel satisfied if it was adjourned. It had been well conducted on both sides, and the House ought to have the opportunity of arriving at a decision upon it.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he had not the least apprehension of meeting his constituents on this question; he hoped his hon. Friend would persevere with the Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the House would not agree to the adjournment of the debate. The discussion had been well conducted on both sides and ought to be brought to a conclusion that evening. He would remind the hon. Gentleman who moved the adjournment that his Motion, if carried, would only be a mode of getting rid of the subject.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 177: Majority 111.

MR. HENNESSY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had referred to a document transmitted to him by the Irish Bishops. As the subject of Irish education with special reference to the allegations in that document was to be brought under the notice of the House a few weeks hence, he should defer his remarks on the general question till that opportunity. All that the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Youghal asked for was inquiry into a system in support of which £270,000 were annually expended, and which did not accord with the consciences of the people. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside), who, with so much ability and success, represented the Protestant party, had clearly showed that the National Board failed to conciliate the Protestants of Ireland; while the protests more than once forwarded by all the Catholic prelates sufficiently proved that they were equally dissatisfied. It was remarkable that the House of Commons, which refused to sanction educational Votes in England, unless they were granted in connection with some religious denomination, adopted a wholly different course in Ireland. The necessity of associating education with religion had been recognized and enforced by every English statesman. The principle had been extended to the Colonies, and, with the solitary exception of Ireland, it was maintained in every portion of Her Majesty's dominions. In that country, however, where the three religious bodies, Presbyterian, Protestant, and Catholic, equally dissented from the Government plan, a narrow-minded system of mixed education was forced upon them by those very Liberal Members who talked loudly in the House and elsewhere of toleration and the liberty of the subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, furnished, doubtless, with statistical fallacies from the portfolios of Dublin Castle, said that in these schools many thousands of Protestants and Catholics would be found, but he had altogether failed to show that those Protestants and Catholics were mixed. As an illustration of the fallacy of the argument thus put forward, he might mention in the county of Cork alone there were 67,000 children in attendance on the national schools, but of these 700 only were Protestants. He hoped the House, by the division that was about to take place, would mark its sense of the necessity existing for inquiry. It was not, however, a mere question of inquiry into statistical results. The people of Ireland came to Parliament asking for that which the wisdom of Parliament had repeatedly sanctioned. They asked for a system of public instruction in which religious teaching might be tolerated. They declared that they had conscientious scruples which were outraged by the secular policy of the so-called National Board. A political party that boasted of its Liberal principles forced that secular instruction on the people. In these days it would seem that the definition of a Liberal was a man who endeavoured to force his own particular opinions on those who differed from him. The Liberals will not tolerate real liberality. When they say, "We believe in mixed education, and insist upon having no other," the Irish people reply, "We are ready to accept that system for any persons who may prefer it; but we desire to have, in addition, a system of religious instruction for any others who, in their consciences, deem such instruction advisable: in a word, we desire Freedom of Education."

MR. BUTT in reply said, the national system had been forced upon the people of Ireland; but, in the Motion he had made, he did not wish to upset the National Board of Education, and it was merely for an address for inquiry. The right hon. Secretary for Ireland alleged that the Primate of Ireland had withdrawn his objections; but the fact was that his Lordship had been shamed into submission by the impossibility of getting education for the Protestant children on any other terms. If the mixed system was good in Ireland, why was it not adopted in England? There had been no justification offered for it by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland; and, as none of the arguments he had offered in support of his Motion had been answered, he must divide the House.

Main Question put.

The House divided: Ayes 62; Noes 196: Majority 134.

PAPER DUTIES REPEAL BILL.

RESOLUTION.

LORD FERMOY: Sir, I feel that I owe an apology to the House for introducing to its notice a subject of such importance at this late hour of the evening; but, perhaps, the best way in which I can show my gratitude to the House, if I am listened to, will be to make my statement as brief as possible. If this were to be the only occasion upon which this most important question was likely to be discussed in this House, I would not take on myself the responsibility of introducing it at this late hour; but my belief is, that so important is this question, that for the remainder of the Session you will find it springing up in almost every question, and at every stage of your proceedings—and, therefore, as I am performing what I believe to be a duty, namely, asking the House to give its opinion upon a question which I believe to be of very great importance, I am not shutting out other hon. Members, if they choose, from bringing forward, on subsequent occasions, other Motions in reference to this subject. In bringing this subject before the House, my vindication is this, that whatever may be the feeling of the House on this question, there is outside its walls a strong feeling of indignation at the conduct of the other House of Parliament. ["Oh, oh!" from the Opposition.] Of course, I do not expect that hon. Gentlemen opposite will acquiesce in that statement. But let me make this remark in answer to the indications of dissent shown by the hon. Gentlemen opposite, that while we can point on our side to numerous meetings held all over the country, calling upon this House to vindicate its rights and privileges, the hon. Gentlemen opposite cannot point to one single meeting in which the opinion was pronounced that the Lords, in the course they took, were right. Now, in the first place, in support of the proposition which I have ventured to lay down, I evidence the meetings which have been held all over the country, and I evidence to you, also, the petitions which have been presented and laid upon the table, signed by over 100,000 persons, all praying that this House may take steps to vindicate its rights and privileges. We had besides that the other day, a meeting held in this Metropolis of delegates from all the large towns in England, at which resolutions were passed calling upon this House to vindicate its privileges. That meeting of delegates consisted of gentlemen from Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Glasgow, Warrington, Norwich, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Oxford, Ipswich, Rochdale, Ashton-under-Lyne, Leeds, and a number of others, amounting altogether to fifty of the principal towns. Now, what was the unanimous opinion expressed by those gentlemen in meeting assembled? Their first resolution is as follows:—

"That the House of Commons having affirmed by Resolution that it rests with itself to impose or repeal taxes, in the opinion of this meeting that House would be degraded by giving assent to the base policy of inaction suggested by Lord Palmerston—a policy tending to the surrender of the dearest rights of the people, and one which ought to be denounced as an act of treason against the Constitution."

The next resolution is to this effect:—

"That no Government deserves the support of the Liberal party that is not prepared to vindicate the privileges of the Commons, and to secure the rights of the people; and that it is the duty of every Liberal Member of Parliament to urge upon the Government to act up to the spirit of its own Resolutions, and if defeated, to dissolve Parliament and appeal at once to the country."

Lord Fernoy

The next resolution is to the following effect:—

"That this meeting tenders its thanks to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone for his able defence of the Constitutional rights of the House of Commons, and relies with confidence on his promise to do everything that is within his power to secure those rights unimpaired."

The last resolution is to this effect:—

"That this meeting calls upon every Member of the House of Commons to use any means that its forms allow to prevent the passing of Supplies, or Bills for the appropriation of Supply, until the aggression of the Lords has been defeated and their illegal Vote rescinded."

Now, that is an indication of feeling, and no doubt a very strong feeling upon this subject, coming as it does from Gentlemen deputed from fifty of the principal towns of England. They have declared that to be their opinion, and as such we are bound to respect it. Then, again, if I refer to an event which has taken place within the last few days—I mean the election for Brighton; the only polling booth opened since the aggression of the Lords, I find the people have there, in a constitutional manner, evinced their opinion in regard to this question. If that be not sufficient vindication for my conduct upon the present occasion, I have only to refer to the declarations which have been made from the Treasury Bench, and made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary. That being the case, I feel that whether I look to the feeling out of doors of the people generally, in public meeting assembled, or in sending delegates to meetings, or I look to the result of the only election that has taken place since the aggression of the Lords, I am warranted in saying that whatever may be the fate of the present Motion in this House, outside the House a large majority of the people will give it their sanction and support.

Now, having made these few remarks in vindication of the course which I have thought proper to take, let me come directly to the point. What I propose to establish, if I can, are these two propositions—"That the rejection by the House of Lords of the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duties is an infringement on the rights and privileges of the House of Commons—and that it is, therefore, incumbent upon the House to adopt a practical measure for the vindication of its rights and privileges.” With regard to the first proposition, I can promise the House that I will not weary them with going into precedents. I think that has been already fully, amply, and satisfactorily settled in this House. We have had, first and foremost, a Committee chosen from among the most experienced men in this House, for the purpose of searching for precedents bearing on this subject, and that Committee having reported, three Resolutions framed upon their Report were submitted to the House by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Treasury. Those Resolutions were unanimously adopted by the House, and I, for one, do not regret the step which I then took to procure their unanimous adoption. These Resolutions are based upon your investigations into the precedents, and I base my argument to-night upon the first and third of them. If I can prove my case by a reference to them, I shall have no necessity, nor is it my intention, to refer at all to the precedents. I take the first Resolution proposed by the noble Lord, which lays down clearly and comprehensively enough to satisfy me as to the extent of our rights and privileges. The first Resolution says:—

“That the right of granting Aids and Supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone, as an essential part of their constitution; and the limitation of all such Grants, as to the matter, manner, measure, and time, is only in them.”

Let us see what has been the history of the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duties in this House, and of the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In that Budget there were introduced two questions, to which alone it is necessary that I should now refer. One was the repeal of the paper duties; the other the addition to the income tax. We assented in this House to the repeal of the paper duties. He proposed to us, and we adopted, to make up the gap in his Budget, an additional penny in the income tax. In that way we sent the Budget up to the Upper House. We repealed the paper duties because we considered them to be an impediment to trade and commerce, and a tax upon knowledge. But no matter on what reasons we did that, and in that way we sent the Budget up to the Upper House. What was done there? The Lords adopted the addition to the income tax, but rejected the Bill which was to relieve the consumers of paper of a million and a quarter of taxation. I say that was a manifest and a clear interference with our rights and privileges. Because I ask how it can be said now that the right to grant Supplies is in the Commons alone as an essential part of their constitution, and that the limitation of all such grants, as to matter, manner, measure, and time is also in them. How can that be said, when, not only as to the matter, but as to the manner and the time, the Lords have interfered and altered a measure referring to the taxation of the country?

There is another point which ought not to be overlooked. Our proposition not only shifted the burthen of taxation from one set of shoulders to another, but altered the form and character of the tax, because for an excise duty on paper, which was a permanent tax, we substituted a penny income tax, which is a terminable tax. Therefore, in that respect, the Lords have interfered not only in the matter, but in the time and the specialty of the tax, as well as with the amount of the exemption. The Act of the House of Peers thus completely invaded and deranged our privileges and rights, even as laid down in the first Resolution which we passed unanimously within the last fortnight.

The next question then—and a very reasonable and natural question—is as to the remedy which is to be proposed. To that question I do not shrink from giving the best answer I can. But before doing so, I may be allowed to repeat what I said last night, that a considerable, although not an insuperable difficulty, has been placed in our way by the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has, since the aggression of the Lords, dealt with the taxation of the country. It is quite clear, however, that if the rejection of the Paper Duties Bill by the Lords is an aggression upon our rights and privileges, the best way, in my mind, if not the only way, to redress it is to send them back the Bill again. The third Resolution, to which I have already alluded, points out, although perhaps not very clearly, the proper manner of doing so. It is this:—

“That, to guard for the future against an undue exercise of that power by the Lords, and to secure to the Commons their rightful control over Taxation and Supply, this House has in its own hands the power so to impose and remit Taxes, and to frame Bills of Supply, that the right of the Commons as to the matter, man-

already weary, but will take refuge in a union which I think is consistent with their conscientious feelings, and tends largely to promote the great cause they have at heart. The silent, but very perceptible, very intelligible, and almost irresistible force of public opinion which was manifested in Ireland in 1859 has also tended to confirm and strengthen to a degree that can scarcely be appreciated the influence of the National system of education in Ireland. To every proposal for breaking down the cardinal principles of that system, to every proposal for establishing denominational education, to every proposal for giving a separate grant to those who insist upon instruction during school hours which is not available for pupils belonging to all Christian Churches, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to reply in the emphatic words used by Sir Robert Peel in 1845:—

"I cannot, of course, question the perfect right of those who conscientiously dissent from a certain plan of public education to withhold their countenance from it, and establish another more in conformity with their own principles. But it is my duty to inform you that to that other plan so established Her Majesty's Government cannot lend their sanction. . . . It would soon be discovered that we must take our choice between the upholding and encouraging of a single system of instruction, founded on the principles of that which is now receiving the sanction of Government, and the granting of public aid to at least three different societies in Ireland—by each of which secular instruction should be combined with religious instruction in the particular doctrine of each religion; one in connection with the Established Church, another with the Presbyterian, and another with the Roman Catholic religion. In such a case all hope of mixed education must be relinquished, and a line of demarcation would be drawn between the children of different religious persuasions, more marked than has hitherto existed at any period. Her Majesty's Government deprecate this result as a great public evil."

Can you imagine a public evil more calculated to inflict permanent injury upon Ireland? What is the great aim and object of Her Majesty's Government and indeed of every one who labours for the good of Ireland? Not to diminish the sincere convictions of the members of any Church, but to secure that, while the private convictions of the Members of all Churches are allowed free play, in the intercourse of practical life, of business, of society, of pleasure, in duties public and in duties private, all classes of the community shall live together as one united people. Who can tell the effect, not merely upon the education, but upon the peace and properity of Ireland, which has been produced by the principles of Government which were inaugurated thirty years ago? If it be true, as Sir James Mackintosh and other writers tell us, that the great power of the British people is due to the freedom of their institutions, how much of that great development we have witnessed in Ireland during the last thirty years is due to the improved Government of which the national system of education has been often and truly called the greatest part?

Mr. Cardwell

Let me ask a question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Upon what grounds is it that he of all persons comes forward to oppose the existing system of education? He filled with honour to himself the office of Attorney General for Ireland under the Government of the Earl of Derby. Is it in that capacity that he seeks to subvert a system with which the name of the Earl of Derby will be for ever associated? Does he make the attempt as the representative of the Church Education Society in Ireland? I find the very same men who as private individuals or dignitaries of the Church cannot reconcile it to their consciences to adopt the principles of the National Board, yet, as members of the Clare Street Board, are not only adopting the identical rules, but forcing them on remonstrant clergymen. Then, I ask, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman make the attempt as the representative of Trinity College? If so, has he ever read the pamphlets and letters in the newspapers by tutors and eminent members of the College, stating that the principle of the National Board has been for more than half a century the principle of Trinity College itself? This morning I received a pamphlet which the late Member for Dublin University, the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland, was kind enough to send me, and in it there is the following passage:—

"The case of Trinity College, though not at all parallel in degree, yet, as to this objection of complicity, seems to be decisive. After the Act of 1793 and the King's letter of 1794, the Board was bound to remove every impediment which stood in the way of a Roman Catholic taking his degree in Arts, and for this purpose to dispense in his favour with every rule of the system as to that part of the course of education in which it would be against his conscience to participate."

And in another passage it is stated:—

"Although there is no express rule subscribed, there is, under the statute, the Royal letter, and the system of the University, a restriction as morally binding upon every tutor as if it were set forth in the words of the rule of the National Board, and subscribed under hand and seal."

I am glad to have on my side the Primate of Ireland and the late Lord Chancellor. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite has not paid his learned Friend, the late Chancellor of Ireland, the compliment of reading his pamphlet, because he said that so far was this reservation about interfering with religious instruction carried, that if a gentleman went into a school, he must not remonstrate with a child whom he found stealing, lest, by referring to the Eighth Commandment, he should infringe the rule of the Board. The House will not expect me to enter into such an argument, but in the Appendix to Mr. Napier's pamphlet, the right hon. and learned Gentleman will find his observation answered. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier) says that he has taken pains to ascertain how far religious instruction is included by the rules of the National Board. This is the case with respect to that matter—

"The school may be opened with prayer; there may be a daily Bible class for all children whose parents consent that they should attend, and none need be deprived of a careful daily instruction in the Word of God, except those whose parents object."

With respect to religious instruction in the schools, it is supposed by many that the education is wholly of a non-religious character; but it is a great mistake to suppose that to be the case even in the schools which most completely reflect the system of the Board. I have before me a paper which has been furnished to me by the Bishop of Derry relative to the books provided by the National Board, and he says they are the best books to be found in any of the Irish schools. I am told that the books sanctioned by the Board are read in all the 5,500 schools connected with this system of education, and never was there a time when there was less of irreligious feeling among the growing youth of Ireland than at present; while not a single instance of proselytism in these schools during the last twenty years is alleged. Being desirous to learn what was going on under this system of education by personal experience rather than from books, I followed the advice of the right hon. and learned Member and attended, wholly unexpectedly, the examination at the model school in Belfast. Dr. Willock and Mr. Anderson were examining the Church of England children, under the superintendence of the Bishop. All I will say with respect to the examination is this, that if the examination had been at Oxford, I might have supposed that the book of examination was the Horæ Paulinæ. The Bishop was educated at Eton. I had a friend with me who had received his education at Rugby, I myself was educated at Winchester, and on comparing notes the observation we made was, "Well, this may be an education from which religion is excluded, but we cannot remember that at a much more mature age, when we were at the great public schools of England, we could have passed so stiff an examination in the "Horæ Paulinæ," as these little children in the Belfast school were passing under the examination of Dr. Willock and Mr. Anderson. Proceeding into another room, we saw the Roman Catholic pupils and the Presbyterian pupils, who I believe are in a majority, in all 1,000, guided by a Roman Catholic master, engaged in singing hymns together, exhibiting the most gratifying evidence of the merits of the mixed system, as the other case did of the separate system. After this I can well believe that the challenge of Dr. Willock would be verified, and that if those whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman represents will produce children from the Church Education schools to compete in Scriptural education with children educated by the National Board, the latter will not be afraid to sustain such a competition and abide by the comparison.

Sir, the step which the House is now called upon to take is one of the most important, and, if taken, it would, in my opinion, be of the most destructive character. But I believe that as the House of Commons have been firm and steadfast in their adherence to the system of National education in times of difficulty, they will not fail to support it in the days of its comparative success. I believe that they will not allow its leading rules to be compromised. Though not at all unconscious that we have still great difficulties to contend with, I maintain that the system has proved successful in point of numbers and in point of results; that it has conferred the greatest benefits upon Ireland, morally, socially, and politically, as well as materially; that it has done more to raise the character of Ireland than any other institution or than any other system, and that it has, therefore, been of the greatest advantage, not to Ireland only, but also to this country. When the Primate has given his concurrence to this system, when the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland has become an advocate for it, when in the north of Ireland public opinion has been exhibited so markedly in its favour, and when throughout the whole country there exists, though not unanimously, the same irresistible feeling, I confidently believe that, while due concession may be made to reasonable objections and just suggestions, the cardinal principles of the system, which have been steadily upheld by successive Governments and by successive Parliaments, this House will not permit to be infringed.

MR. LEFROY said, he felt it his duty to express, as shortly and as clearly as he could, the opinions of those with whom, together with his right hon. and learned Friend below him (Mr. Whiteside), he fully concurred on this question. He regretted that the subject had not been discussed at an earlier period of the Session, and still more that it should then be discussed under the pressure of other equally important business. He had never shrunk to express his regret for the course pursued by the National Board. He had felt that it could not be satisfactory to Ireland, and still less satisfactory to the ministers of the Established Church in Ireland, whose views he particularly represented on this occasion. He had never, since he had the honour of a seat in that House, hesitated to express that opinion; nor had he, on the other hand, hesitated to say that the system recommended by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Butt) would equally fail to give satisfaction. The ministers of the Established Church asked for no teaching but that which might be properly, and should be, taught in a Christian nation. They asked to have the Scriptures read in their schools, and they properly declined to take part in those schools where the Scriptures were practically excluded. If nuns' schools, if the schools of Presbyterians, if the schools of Wesleyans, were supported by National grants, surely the same advantage ought to be conceded to the Church of England. He therefore regretted that the Government had not taken steps to extend the National system in a manner which would enable all to partake in it, or that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland could hold out no hope that such a modification in the system would be adopted.

MR. HENNESSY moved the adjourn-

Mr. Cardwell

ment of the debate. There were many hon. Gentlemen who wished to speak, and as there was another important Motion on the paper he thought it was not right that the whole night should be occupied by Irish Members.

THE O'DONOGHUE seconded the Motion.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he thought the hon. Member could hardly be serious in moving the adjournment. Here was a Member of an Irish county, who was constantly making complaints that Irish business was not properly carried on, when a debate upon a most important Irish question had commenced in good earnest, absolutely moving its adjournment. He (Mr. B. Osborne) had considerable interest in this question, perhaps more than the hon. Gentleman, as he contributed to more schools. He had come down to hear the debate, and he thought the people of Ireland and the constituents of the hon. Gentleman could hardly feel satisfied if it was adjourned. It had been well conducted on both sides, and the House ought to have the opportunity of arriving at a decision upon it.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he had not the least apprehension of meeting his constituents on this question; he hoped his hon. Friend would persevere with the Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the House would not agree to the adjournment of the debate. The discussion had been well conducted on both sides and ought to be brought to a conclusion that evening. He would remind the hon. Gentleman who moved the adjournment that his Motion, if carried, would only be a mode of getting rid of the subject.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 177: Majority 111.

MR. HENNESSY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had referred to a document transmitted to him by the Irish Bishops. As the subject of Irish education with special reference to the allegations in that document was to be brought under the notice of the House a few weeks hence, he should defer his remarks on the general question till that opportunity. All that the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Youghal asked for was inquiry into a system in support of which £270,000 were annually expended, and which did not accord with the consciences of the people. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside), who, with so much ability and success, represented the Protestant party, had clearly showed that the National Board failed to conciliate the Protestants of Ireland; while the protests more than once forwarded by all the Catholic prelates sufficiently proved that they were equally dissatisfied. It was remarkable that the House of Commons, which refused to sanction educational Votes in England, unless they were granted in connection with some religious denomination, adopted a wholly different course in Ireland. The necessity of associating education with religion had been recognized and enforced by every English statesman. The principle had been extended to the Colonies, and, with the solitary exception of Ireland, it was maintained in every portion of Her Majesty's dominions. In that country, however, where the three religious bodies, Presbyterian, Protestant, and Catholic, equally dissented from the Government plan, a narrow-minded system of mixed education was forced upon them by those very Liberal Members who talked loudly in the House and elsewhere of toleration and the liberty of the subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, furnished, doubtless, with statistical fallacies from the portfolios of Dublin Castle, said that in these schools many thousands of Protestants and Catholics would be found, but he had altogether failed to show that those Protestants and Catholics were mixed. As an illustration of the fallacy of the argument thus put forward, he might mention in the county of Cork alone there were 67,000 children in attendance on the national schools, but of these 700 only were Protestants. He hoped the House, by the division that was about to take place, would mark its sense of the necessity existing for inquiry. It was not, however, a mere question of inquiry into statistical results. The people of Ireland came to Parliament asking for that which the wisdom of Parliament had repeatedly sanctioned. They asked for a system of public instruction in which religious teaching might be tolerated. They declared that they had conscientious scruples which were outraged by the secular policy of the so-called National Board. A political party that boasted of its Liberal principles forced that secular instruction on the people. In these days it would seem that the definition of a Liberal was a man who endeavoured to force his own particular opinions on those who differed from him. The Liberals will not tolerate real liberality. When they say, "We believe in mixed education, and insist upon having no other," the Irish people reply, "We are ready to accept that system for any persons who may prefer it; but we desire to have, in addition, a system of religious instruction for any others who, in their consciences, deem such instruction advisable: in a word, we desire Freedom of Education."

MR. BUTT in reply said, the national system had been forced upon the people of Ireland; but, in the Motion he had made, he did not wish to upset the National Board of Education, and it was merely for an address for inquiry. The right hon. Secretary for Ireland alleged that the Primate of Ireland had withdrawn his objections; but the fact was that his Lordship had been shamed into submission by the impossibility of getting education for the Protestant children on any other terms. If the mixed system was good in Ireland, why was it not adopted in England? There had been no justification offered for it by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland; and, as none of the arguments he had offered in support of his Motion had been answered, he must divide the House.

Main Question put.

The House divided: Ayes 62; Noes 196: Majority 134.

PAPER DUTIES REPEAL BILL.

RESOLUTION.

LORD FERMOY: Sir, I feel that I owe an apology to the House for introducing to its notice a subject of such importance at this late hour of the evening; but, perhaps, the best way in which I can show my gratitude to the House, if I am listened to, will be to make my statement as brief as possible. If this were to be the only occasion upon which this most important question was likely to be discussed in this House, I would not take on myself the responsibility of introducing it at this late hour; but my belief is, that so important is this question, that for the remainder of the Session you will find it springing up in almost every question, and at every stage of your proceedings—and, therefore, as I am performing what I believe to be a duty, namely, asking the House to give its opinion upon a question which I believe to be of very great importance, I am not

shutting out other hon. Members, if they choose, from bringing forward, on subsequent occasions, other Motions in reference to this subject. In bringing this subject before the House, my vindication is this, that whatever may be the feeling of the House on this question, there is outside its walls a strong feeling of indignation at the conduct of the other House of Parliament. ["Oh, oh!" from the Opposition.] Of course, I do not expect that hon. Gentlemen opposite will acquiesce in that statement. But let me make this remark in answer to the indications of dissent shown by the hon. Gentlemen opposite, that while we can point on our side to numerous meetings held all over the country, calling upon this House to vindicate its rights and privileges, the hon. Gentlemen opposite cannot point to one single meeting in which the opinion was pronounced that the Lords, in the course they took, were right. Now, in the first place, in support of the proposition which I have ventured to lay down, I evidence the meetings which have been held all over the country, and I evidence to you, also, the petitions which have been presented and laid upon the table, signed by over 100,000 persons, all praying that this House may take steps to vindicate its rights and privileges. We had besides that the other day, a meeting held in this Metropolis of delegates from all the large towns in England, at which resolutions were passed calling upon this House to vindicate its privileges. That meeting of delegates consisted of gentlemen from Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Glasgow, Warrington, Norwich, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Oxford, Ipswich, Rochdale, Ashton-under-Lyne, Leeds, and a number of others, amounting altogether to fifty of the principal towns. Now, what was the unanimous opinion expressed by those gentlemen in meeting assembled? Their first resolution is as follows:—

"That the House of Commons having affirmed by Resolution that it rests with itself to impose or repeal taxes, in the opinion of this meeting that House would be degraded by giving assent to the base policy of inaction suggested by Lord Palmerston—a policy tending to the surrender of the dearest rights of the people, and one which ought to be denounced as an act of treason against the Constitution."

The next resolution is to this effect:—

"That no Government deserves the support of the Liberal party that is not prepared to vindicate the privileges of the Commons, and to secure the rights of the people; and that it is the duty of every Liberal Member of Parliament to urge upon the Government to act up to the spirit of its own Resolutions, and if defeated, to dissolve Parliament and appeal at once to the country."

Lord Fernoy

The next resolution is to the following effect:—

"That this meeting tenders its thanks to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone for his able defence of the Constitutional rights of the House of Commons, and relies with confidence on his promise to do everything that is within his power to secure those rights unimpaired."

The last resolution is to this effect:—

"That this meeting calls upon every Member of the House of Commons to use any means that its forms allow to prevent the passing of Supplies, or Bills for the appropriation of Supply, until the aggression of the Lords has been defeated and their illegal Vote rescinded."

Now, that is an indication of feeling, and no doubt a very strong feeling upon this subject, coming as it does from Gentlemen deputed from fifty of the principal towns of England. They have declared that to be their opinion, and as such we are bound to respect it. Then, again, if I refer to an event which has taken place within the last few days—I mean the election for Brighton; the only polling booth opened since the aggression of the Lords, I find the people have there, in a constitutional manner, evinced their opinion in regard to this question. If that be not sufficient vindication for my conduct upon the present occasion, I have only to refer to the declarations which have been made from the Treasury Bench, and made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary. That being the case, I feel that whether I look to the feeling out of doors of the people generally, in public meeting assembled, or in sending delegates to meetings, or I look to the result of the only election that has taken place since the aggression of the Lords, I am warranted in saying that whatever may be the fate of the present Motion in this House, outside the House a large majority of the people will give it their sanction and support.

Now, having made these few remarks in vindication of the course which I have thought proper to take, let me come directly to the point. What I propose to establish, if I can, are these two propositions—"That the rejection by the House of Lords of the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duties is an infringement on the rights and privileges of the House of Commons—and that it is, therefore, incumbent upon the House to adopt a practical measure for the vindication of its rights and privileges.” With regard to the first proposition, I can promise the House that I will not weary them with going into precedents. I think that has been already fully, amply, and satisfactorily settled in this House. We have had, first and foremost, a Committee chosen from among the most experienced men in this House, for the purpose of searching for precedents bearing on this subject, and that Committee having reported, three Resolutions framed upon their Report were submitted to the House by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Treasury. Those Resolutions were unanimously adopted by the House, and I, for one, do not regret the step which I then took to procure their unanimous adoption. These Resolutions are based upon your investigations into the precedents, and I base my argument tonight upon the first and third of them. If I can prove my case by a reference to them, I shall have no necessity, nor is it my intention, to refer at all to the precedents. I take the first Resolution proposed by the noble Lord, which lays down clearly and comprehensively enough to satisfy me as to the extent of our rights and privileges. The first Resolution says:—

“That the right of granting Aids and Supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone, as an essential part of their constitution; and the limitation of all such Grants, as to the matter, manner, measure, and time, is only in them.”

Let us see what has been the history of the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duties in this House, and of the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In that Budget there were introduced two questions, to which alone it is necessary that I should now refer. One was the repeal of the paper duties; the other the addition to the income tax. We assented in this House to the repeal of the paper duties. He proposed to us, and we adopted, to make up the gap in his Budget, an additional penny in the income tax. In that way we sent the Budget up to the Upper House. We repealed the paper duties because we considered them to be an impediment to trade and commerce, and a tax upon knowledge. But no matter on what reasons we did that, and in that way we sent the Budget up to the Upper House. What was done there? The Lords adopted the addition to the income tax, but rejected the Bill which was to relieve the consumers of paper of a million and a quarter of taxation. I say that was a manifest and a clear interference with our rights and privileges. Because I ask how it can be said now that the right to grant Supplies is in the Commons alone as an essential part of their constitution, and that the limitation of all such grants, as to matter, manner, measure, and time is also in them. How can that be said, when, not only as to the matter, but as to the manner and the time, the Lords have interfered and altered a measure referring to the taxation of the country?

There is another point which ought not to be overlooked. Our proposition not only shifted the burthen of taxation from one set of shoulders to another, but altered the form and character of the tax, because for an excise duty on paper, which was a permanent tax, we substituted a penny income tax, which is a terminable tax. Therefore, in that respect, the Lords have interfered not only in the matter, but in the time and the specialty of the tax, as well as with the amount of the exemption. The Act of the House of Peers thus completely invaded and deranged our privileges and rights, even as laid down in the first Resolution which we passed unanimously within the last fortnight.

The next question then—and a very reasonable and natural question—is as to the remedy which is to be proposed. To that question I do not shrink from giving the best answer I can. But before doing so, I may be allowed to repeat what I said last night, that a considerable, although not an insuperable difficulty, has been placed in our way by the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has, since the aggression of the Lords, dealt with the taxation of the country. It is quite clear, however, that if the rejection of the Paper Duties Bill by the Lords is an aggression upon our rights and privileges, the best way, in my mind, if not the only way, to redress it is to send them back the Bill again. The third Resolution, to which I have already alluded, points out, although perhaps not very clearly, the proper manner of doing so. It is this:—

“That, to guard for the future against an undue exercise of that power by the Lords, and to secure to the Commons their rightful control over Taxation and Supply, this House has in its own hands the power so to impose and remit Taxes, and to frame Bills of Supply, that the right of the Commons as to the matter, manner, measure, and time, may be maintained inviolate."

As I read that, it means that for the future,—for I admit that it only deals with the future while asserting a principle which can apply to the present—if you think the Lords are about to interfere unfairly or unjustly with your rights and privileges as regards taxation, you can so draw your Bills and frame them, that the Lords shall not be able to touch them. The meaning of that I take to be, that you can incorporate with a Money Bill the repeal of the paper duties. I may be unfortunately suspected of being rather disposed to propose strong measures upon a subject of the kind, but I am merely giving my own opinion, and the Resolution which I propose does not bind anybody as to the means to be adopted. If the Resolution were carried by the House, the proper persons to carry it out and to prepare the fitting measures to the House would be Her Majesty's Government. I merely give my own opinion because I do not wish to shirk the question. What I should do would be this. We know by experience that the Lords have not always been right upon other questions. It has been usual in the history of the country, when the two Houses differed upon any important political question—when this House adopted a particular line or a particular Bill, and the other House rejected it—to give the House of Lords a locus penitentie, and send up again the Bill they have rejected. One of the best features of the manner in which the Lords dealt with this question was, that when they rejected this Bill they believed the feeling of the country was with them. That, I repeat, is so far a very good and cheerful feature. Now, suppose we can show, after a full and fair discussion of the question in this House, and out of it, that the feeling of the country is strong against the Lords, not on the question of finance, but as respects their dealing and interfering with our rights and privileges in reference to taxation—why, then, I say, by sending back the Bill again pure and simple, you may give the Lords an opportunity of passing it, as they passed the Reform Bill, the Catholic Emancipation Bill, and the Jewish Relief Bill, after many previous rejections of those measures. That is the constitutional course, and I, for one, should feel disposed to adopt it.

If it be said that the Lords would not pass it, we can then go, if needful, the further step, and incorporate the Bill with some Money Bill which the Lords cannot touch. But I repeat that it is not my business to show what the Government ought to do; all I have to do is to show that I have a policy and opinion of my own. Unless something be done the three Resolutions, which are good enough for the future, as an assertion of our rights and privileges are perfectly useless on the present occasion. I hope, and indeed I assume, that I shall have the sanction and support of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Upon all subjects he has the happy gift of speaking forcibly and clearly, but if there was anybody through the whole length and breadth of the land who spoke clearly and boldly upon the subject it was the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He told us, in words to which I cannot refer now, that it was the duty of this House to take action. He expressed a desire to know under what form of constitution we were living when we submitted to this aggression of the Lords. I repeat, then, that if we do not take action, we complicate the matter very much, for it will be a precedent against us hereafter. The Report of the Committee recounts the Paper Duties Bill as one of the very Bills which the Lords rejected, and unless we take active means to restore our position on the constitutional ground, this will be pointed at as a precedent hereafter.

Lord Fermoy

I may be told that the course I am taking is not a politic one. That is unfortunate, but I am not to blame for it. The question is, whether what I am proposing is clear, and a straightforward and a fair way of dealing with the question. I believe that on this, as on all other occasions in life, the best policy is honesty. Therefore, although I may not be successful to-night, or this Session, I hold that it is the duty of us who are the popular party in this country to take the course which we believe to be just to preserve and vindicate our rights, and if we fail, then let the responsibility be upon the shoulders of those who, although professing in principle the same views, will not go into the lobby with us upon this question. If this policy be bad, I say that they have made it bad by their pusillanimity. Therefore I repudiate the language held as to the policy of the Motion which I, as a very humble individual, am bringing forward upon the present occasion. There is nothing so essential to the greatness of England and the durability of her representative institutions as that public men should keep faith with the public. I want to know, for one, whether Her Majesty's Government are satisfied with the present state of things. I want to know from the Treasury benches whether, looking back to the occurrences of the last month or two, beginning with the aggression of the Lords, and the rejection of the Paper Duties Repeal Bill, and going down to the adoption of the three Resolutions, they are satisfied that the House, as regards their rights and privileges, are placed in as satisfactory a position as before the rejection of this Bill by the Lords. I say, for one, that my belief is that it is not. I say that your three Resolutions do nothing to redress our position. It is a great deal, I admit, to have got that first Resolution by a unanimous vote in this House. It was never my fate to be present before in this House at a unanimous vote on a great question, and, therefore, I voted on that occasion with great pleasure. But, to use the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "You must take action." Unless you do that, you will have done nothing as regards the present case. Now, Sir, I promised the House that I would be short in my address. Had I been fortunate enough to have got up earlier in the evening, I might have been more diffuse; but I say this, in concluding, that I believe out of doors you will find that the people every day are turning their attention more and more to this subject. My belief is, that every day it is gaining importance in the public mind. They will soon see that which is patent to the minds of, at least, every man near me, that the rights and privileges of the people of this country and of this House are identical. Our forefathers suffered to maintain the rights of this House against the aggressions of the Crown. Happily, we live now under a Monarch who will never make an aggression upon the rights of the people or of the Commons; but there is another aggression which has been made by the hereditary branch of the Legislature. It is our duty to walk in the steps of our forefathers, and, if necessary, to make sacrifices, as they made them, to vindicate the rights and privileges of the Commons of England.

MR. WHITE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

"That the rejection by the House of Lords of the Bill for the repeal of the Paper Duties is an encroachment on the Rights and Privileges of the House of Commons; and it is therefore incumbent upon this House to adopt a practical measure for the vindication of its Rights and Privileges."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I hardly think that my noble Friend could seriously intend to call upon this House to enter upon the large and important question to which his Resolution relates,—beginning, as he did, at half-past eleven at night. My noble Friend, no doubt, was anxious to record, in a manner more formal than he thought fit to do on the debate on the Resolutions I had the honour to propose, his opinions and sympathies on the question between the two Houses of Parliament. I do not quarrel with my noble Friend for taking this opportunity of recording his individual opinions; but I would humbly submit to the House that, after the grave and serious discussion which took place on this great and important question on a former occasion, it is not desirable to stir again in the matter at the present moment. The House, I think, may be well content to rest on the Resolutions it has adopted. Moreover, I would venture to submit that the first proposition of my noble Friend is little more than an echo of that which the House has already affirmed; while his second proposition points to a result which my noble Friend is not himself prepared to indicate. It is not enough for my noble Friend to say that if the House agrees to his Resolution, he throws on the Government the responsibility of discovering what he intended to suggest, and of carrying into effect his undefined and unexplained intentions. I beg to decline, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, the task which my noble Friend wishes to impose on them. As I stated on a former occasion, in answer to a question, I am well satisfied to rest on the Resolutions which the House has affirmed. I believe those Resolutions sufficiently record our opinions as to our own rights and privileges, and point out for the future the means to which we may have recourse, if necessary, to assert and make good those privileges and those rights. I shall not enter now into the subject, or detain the House longer from coming to a decision on the matter. I shall at once move the previous question, being of opinion that my noble Friend has not shown his usual judgment in introducing this subject on the present occasion; and that it is fitting the House should decline to enter further on the discussion of the question. Sir, I beg to move the Previous Question.

Whereupon Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put."

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he could not compliment the noble Lord on the speech he had just addressed to the House. It seemed to him that in the crisis of a revolution which the Conservatives had originated, the noble Lord had not shown proper respect to the House in dismissing a grave and important subject like this in a few sentences, and condescending to use as an argument against the Resolutions the late hour at which they were introduced. He wanted to know whether it was come to this, that the head of the Government, the leader of the Liberal party, could afford to treat the gravest interests of the House of Commons in this jaunty manner, as if of no consequence whatever. They had passed Resolutions which had met with the cordial acceptance of the right hon. Gentleman opposite—the leader of the country gentlemen of England—and which manifestly conveyed a censure on the House of Lords in the course they had pursued. Yet no action had been taken to indicate the rights of the Commons, and to resist the imposition of a heavy tax against their will. He complained of almost everybody in the House. [Laughter.] That might sound very ridiculous, but such was his feeling. He complained of himself as well as of the rest. He blamed himself for having let the China Vote go two nights since. They were never told whether that money was for the first China war or for the second, or for the Persian war. The accounts had not been made up for some years, and the Government could not or would not reveal the object of the Vote. That was only another sample of the treatment the House received. He had often heard it said in private that the noble Viscount was a Tory, and he had done what he could to defend him from that accusation. But whether the noble Viscount were a Tory or a Radical, it was clear that a serious aggression had been perpetrated on the liberties of the country and the privileges of the Commons, with impunity as far as the noble Lord was concerned. He had a right, too, he thought, to complain of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. At his instigation they voted a most unpopular tax—a 1*d.* of addition to the income tax, when their constituents expected a reduction of at least 3*d.* They consented to do that in the hope that they would at least effect the removal of an objectionable tax, which could not exist longer without giving rise to litigation. The noble Lords in "another place" rejected that measure which the Chancellor of the Exchequer recommended, and they all heard the right hon. Gentleman come down to the House and denounce the proceedings of the House of Lords in language on the verge of revolutionary—language almost as strong as any that was used at Chartist meetings out of doors. Their feelings were aroused by his eloquent invective; they sympathized with his demand for "action." But to what a lame, impotent conclusion had the matter been brought, when the right hon. Gentleman came down to the House last night, and swallowing his indignation and putting his tail between his legs, accepted the act of the House of Lords? He entertained a sincere respect for the noble Lord the Member for London, but he regretted exceedingly that he was not out of office at this time. If the Conservatives had been on the Treasury bench, and the Liberals in Opposition, what an eloquent vindication of constitutional privileges and denunciations of the conduct of the Lords would they not have had! He could not possibly overrate the importance of the present crisis. He could not disguise from himself that something had gone out of them—that some privilege, some power had been lost, and yet this only roused the mirth of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Was it come to this, that the loss of a valuable right, which would influence the destinies of their country for all time, was only cause for laughter? He did not scruple to say, and he said it with premeditation, that he would rather the French occupied Yorkshire at that moment than that this had happened. If the French were in Yorkshire, they might look with confidence to their being very soon removed; but he had no hope that the precedent laid down by the House of Lords, and acquiesced in by the House of Commons, could be as readily got rid of. An eloquent writer on the Constitution of England said, that what to-day was a fact to-morrow was a precedent, and the next day a law. They had gravely set to work to make a law of this proceeding of the Lords, and he could not compliment them on their handiwork. Though little was said about this matter out of doors then, the day would come when they would hear more of it. He could not compliment hon. Gentlemen opposite on their logic when they cheered because it was mentioned that there was not much feeling in the country, as though the House of Lords must be right on that account. Suppose the House of Lords had many years ago by an Act abolished the corn laws as far as they were concerned, would that circumstance alone have induced hon. Gentlemen opposite to acquiesce in such a proceeding? It might be all very well for those who wished to make things pleasant to pass this question by; but that would not do for those who were not represented in that House. They were now very much in the position of France before the Revolution, when she had a narrow suffrage and general corruption. The people out of doors were aware of this, and believed there was scarcely a public contract which was not in some way dealt with as a job. Men asked whether things would be worse if they had a larger suffrage. And though, perhaps, no very definite mode of action was perceived, the day was not far off when there would be a great disturbance arising out of these affairs. He sincerely believed he was acting as a true Conservative in recommending the House of Lords as soon as possible to retrace their steps, for now they would stand responsible for every calamity of a financial character that might happen to this country. Yes—he repeated that by interfering as they had done with the management of the finances, the House of Lords had made themselves responsible for every disaster which might follow from their meddling. They ought, therefore, to come down in sackcloth and ashes to retract their unjustifiable proceeding.

Viscount Palmerston

MR. CLAY said, that the hon. Baronet objected to the position of this question as furnishing a precedent for the course taken by the House of Lords. It was precisely on these grounds that he (Mr. Clay) deeply regretted the Motion of his noble Friend, not that he took a lower estimate than did the noble Lord of the importance of the subject with which that Motion dealt. It was the most important which had agitated the House since he had been a Member of it—not that he felt less keenly than the noble Lord, or than any man in the country, the position of humiliation in which the Commons rested under the attack and premeditated insult of the House of Lords; but because he was convinced that the blow aimed by the noble Lord would be weak and impotent, would fall short of the object he wished to strike, and would be the increase and the record of their shame. The traditionary power of the House of Commons depended on the support of the people whom they represented, and it was useless to conceal the fact that in this matter the people were not heartily with them. The majority out of doors believed that the refusal of the House of Lords to repeal the paper duty was financially wise. This was not his opinion. He gave his adhesion to the wisdom of that repeal; but it was the very general belief. Popular opinion never took nice distinctions, and in this case the people refused to separate the question of the financial sagacity of the House of Lords from that much more important question the violation of the spirit of the Constitution. Had his noble Friend never heard the Scotch motto which taught him to “bide his time”? He (Mr. Clay) was content to bide his in the confident assurance that no distant time would bring the opportunity, when, with the support of an enthusiastic people, the House of Commons might recover the position which for a time it had lost. Meanwhile, he considered the Motion of his noble Friend was in every way mischievous. It damaged the question of paper duty repeal, for repealers on the opposite benches would on this occasion naturally vote against his noble Friend, and the division list would be no accurate indication of the number of hon. Members who were in favour of the repeal of the Excise duty on paper. Still more did it damage the position of the House of Commons in its quarrel with the House of Lords. For what was this position? At present the Resolutions which they had passed were a protest—weak and insufficient it was true—but a protest; more or less, that the House of Lords had violated the spirit of the Constitution, and, at least, there was no confession on their records that a majority in the Commons was not of this opinion. But the defeat of the Motion of the noble Lord—and its defeat was certain—made history and a precedent, and it would stand for ever and a day recorded on their Journals, that in 1860 a large majority of the House of Commons had decided that the House of Lords, in its rejection of the Bill for the repeal of the paper duty, had not “encroached on their rights and privileges.” Was it not madness to invite such a record by this unhappy and ill-advised

Motion. But there were other grounds on which also he objected to it. The most careless observer suspected that this unfortunate quarrel had caused difficulties—it might be differences in the Cabinet. Was it wise in hon. Gentleman below the gangway, by such a Motion as this, to increase those difficulties, probably most keenly felt by those Members of the Cabinet who more especially represented and sympathized with the opinions of the Radicals? If these difficulties were to become insuperable—which he, and many others on the same benches, would sincerely deplore—did not the Radical party owe to these right hon. Gentlemen to leave them the judges of the manner and the time when these differences should be insisted on, rather than to challenge them to a vote, which they might have some—though he hoped no invincible—scruple in avoiding, although they must feel it to be most inopportune. His noble Friend would perhaps say, what matter if the Government does break up. The fall of the Government might not very seriously matter to the Radical party; but it did matter seriously in what way the Government fell. Let hon. Members below the gangway remember for a moment the origin of the present Government. It was an experiment to try whether an administration, fulfilling the conditions of strength and permanence, which the country in the present state of Europe imperatively demanded, could be formed by a union of all sections of the Liberal party. It must be confessed that up to the present time that experiment had not been a very happy one. If he was asked where was the fault, he would say that which it is safe to state of all domestic quarrels, that there were faults on both sides. The Radicals complained that there was some want of the sympathy and consideration on the part of the Government for their position and opinions, which they had a right to expect. Should he give an instance? The Home Secretary, when he gave up the obnoxious clause in the Census Bill, might have done it with a better grace, and might have spared them a speech which, though clever and amusing, smacked too much of the lecture of a college Proctor to be very palatable to grown-up men. A few days before this, the first Minister, in answering a question on this same subject, might have conveyed his answer in some twenty courteous words, rather than in a dozen of very scant courtesy. But more than this, when the noble Viscount introduced his celebrated Resolutions, he might surely, out of consideration for the strong views entertained on the subject by his Radical supporters, have given to his speech some of the vigour which those Resolutions wanted. The effect of that speech, on the contrary, was most unhappy on the Liberal Members, and whatever little starch there was in the Resolutions was effectually washed out of them by the speech of the noble Lord. On the other hand, they, the Radicals, were much too ready, when the Government did not agree with them, to jump up with their denunciations that the Whigs—to use an Unparliamentary phrase—were “throwing them over,” and to remind them, somewhat ungenerously, that they kept their places solely by Radical support. These differences were small and undignified, therefore they were the more easily reconciled. The measures of the Government had been on the whole as liberal as they could fairly expect, and he must remind his Friends that if they believed that the compact between themselves and the Whigs was to be carried out by the Whigs turning Radicals, they looked to a one-sided bargain very little creditable to their sagacity to hope for—still less creditable to Whig honesty to have performed. The motto of their union should be, “Bear and forbear.” If, then, the Government fell from the open attack of legitimate foes on the opposite benches, it would matter little to the interests of the Liberal party—they would be as united as ever—at least as ready to renew a league which would not have been proved to have failed. But if, on the other hand, the breaking up of the Cabinet arose from differences among the different sections of the Liberal party of which it was composed, it would be taken as a confession that the experiment of union had failed; that the Whigs and Radicals could not lie in the same bed, and the demand of the country for a strong and permanent Administration would be supplied by a new combination of parties, which would inevitably be unfavourable to the advance of Liberal opinions. For the reasons he had given he should support the Previous Question.

Mr. Clay

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I entirely concur, Sir, in the propriety and wisdom of the course which has been proposed by my noble Friend near me (Viscount Palmerston), and I like wise join in the regrets that have been expressed with regard to the conclusions to which the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone arrived when he thought it his duty to submit this Motion to this House, and to submit this Motion upon a subject of such gravity and importance, when the hand of the clock was approaching the hour of midnight. But, Sir, I cannot refuse to state the reasons why I shall support the Motion of my noble Friend, after the allusions which have been made to me by the noble Lord. When the noble Lord, feeling I dare say the difficulties of his position, which are not to be dissembled, was disposed to throw the responsibility for a portion of those difficulties, on the statement with respect to the financial demands of the public service which I made last night, I must say I think it would have been most improper on my part, both as respects the one side of the House and as respects the other, if I had not made it my sincere and honest purpose, in submitting that statement to the House, to leave the great constitutional question that has been opened within the last few weeks precisely as I found it. I do not think it my duty—I think, on the one hand, it was entirely at variance with my duty—to use that occasion for the purpose either of taunt or accusation against any man or body of men. I think, on the other hand, I should have been wrong if I had placed that statement in such a form as to weaken the position of the noble Lord and others with whom in principle I agree. I therefore think undoubtedly it was right to state, what I could not have avoided stating without absurdity, that a sum of money was in the Exchequer, in consequence of a vote of the House of Lords, and available for the services of the year—the estimate of which I made as nearly and as faithfully as I could. But, lest I should be unjustly accused of having receded from the opinions I had expressed, and which I conscientiously entertain, I spoke of that sum of money proceeding from the paper duties, and of the question of the repeal of the paper duties, as a matter dependent—which I believe it to be dependent—upon the pleasure of the British House of Commons. Now, Sir, that was the position in which I sincerely and humbly sought to leave the question without prejudice; and therefore, do not let the noble Lord state that he is placed in any difficulty because of expressions used or proposals made last night.

With respect to the Motion of the noble Lord I concur entirely in the opinion that it is not fitting for this House to pronounce an opinion on the matter; and for these reasons. As has been stated by my noble Friend near me, the first portion of the Motion is but a repetition, in a form slightly more combative, of that which, as he thinks, and as I think, the House has in substance already assented to. With regard to the second part of the Motion, I confess I entertain to it more serious objections. The second part of that Motion suggests that it is incumbent upon the House to adopt a peculiar measure for the vindication of its rights and privileges. Now, Sir, to what does that declaration amount? It amounts to so many words and to nothing more than words. It does not advance the House one inch towards any practical solution of the question, but it goes to the country at large on the principle of being in earnest without any real pledge or guarantee for our sincerity or our Resolutions upon it. Sir, so far as words are concerned, it appears to me that upon this occasion we have used them in sufficiency. The words proposed by my noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) in his third Resolution—words which were adopted unanimously by this House—were well adapted for the purpose, and being well adapted for the purpose ought not to be loaded with surplusage. It is no slight matter for this House to take new steps on a subject of this gravity. We ought not to proceed to accumulate Resolutions upon Resolutions. We have said all, in my opinion, that we can safely say. What remains is the question, whether we can safely proceed to action? If we can proceed to action by some measure for which we think the House is prepared, or on which we can induce it to act, then let that issue be raised; but do not let us give new promises of action which, after all, are mere declarations, and with respect to which I would even say they are scarcely honest promises so long as we speak of action vaguely in the abstract, instead of pointing—which would be difficult to do—to some positive and practical method of proceeding, whereby this House might bring to an issue the question on which its attention has been engaged. It is all very well for the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone—it sounds very well in the House; it will read very well to-morrow morning in the newspapers; and I have no doubt it will continue his

of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, but he was not allowed by the Chairman of this great Liberal party, which met in the tea-room, to move it. I was amazed at all this. I had come down to the House to support the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth, or that of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Edwin James). But what do I find now? I find that after the lapse of ten days my noble Friend, actuated, no doubt, by the best and the most patriotic motives, moves this Resolution—moves it, I am ready to admit, in a temperate, well argued, and good speech; but why did not he make that speech on the former occasion? Has the distinction between silence and action appealed to his feelings too! Why did not he support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, or that of his hon. and learned Colleague? In what a position we are placed! We have got nothing but these four Resolutions,—those three miserable Resolutions which were agreed to the other night, and this fourth one, upon which its Mover tells us that we may put what gloss we like. Under these circumstances, having voted against the Resolutions of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, I cannot support that of my noble Friend. We who voted in the minority upon the previous occasion should, if we supported this Motion, place ourselves in a most miserable and contemptible position. I can well understand the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Tavistock (Sir John Trelawny). That goes to the point. I can understand it, although I cannot agree with the speech which he has made to-night. I think that he made a great mistake with regard to this House, and was unjust to the character of public men in this country, when he adduced the instance of the French Chamber. Whatever electoral corruption there may be in this country, I take it upon myself to say that the character of public men on both sides of this House is above impeachment and above the breath of slander. I much regret that my hon. Friend should have adduced that example, because I believe that, whatever may be the faults of our constitutional system, no man, either in or out of this House, can say that any breath of slander can attach to any public man in this country. To go back to the material question before the House, I must say that I am placed in a most awkward position. I have heard the speech of the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer. His action is deferred; he is evidently standing at ease. I do not know what we are to look to from him, but I cannot vote for the proposition of my noble Friend the Member for Marylebone. I wish he had left things as they were or voted for the Amendment of his hon. and learned Colleague. As it is, I think, he is placing us in a ridiculous position, and to avoid that I am obliged to fly to that general refuge, the Previous Question.

Mr. Bernal Osborne

MR. CONINGHAM said, that whatever might be the opinion of the House with reference to the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, he could not but think that in the opinion not only of the House, but of the country, attacks upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer came with a bad grace from the part of the House in which he had the honour to sit. He was one of those who had deliberately recorded his vote in favour of the repeal of the paper duty, and he had seen nothing which induced him to change his opinion as to the expediency of that vote. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he brought forward his great and comprehensive Budget—the soundness of which would be vindicated by time—brought it forward in a speech of unanswerable logic, and throughout loyally supported it. He could not say that the support which it received from the right hon. Gentleman's colleagues was equally cordial. If the two noble Lords who were well known to exercise a dominant influence in the Cabinet had as loyally supported their colleague as he had loyally vindicated his opinions, he ventured to say that the third reading of the Bill would have been carried by a quite sufficient majority to prevent the Whig followers of the noble Lords from encouraging the Tory party to reverse the decision of the Representatives of the people. He ventured to say that the repeal of the paper duty would have been an infinite benefit to the people of this country; that the Peers, acting as they had done, had excited a very angry feeling in the minds of the people, and, if the House ventured to interpose between the people and the privileges of the irresponsible part of the Legislature, they would incur the angry vengeance of their constituencies when they again looked to them for support.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the House is placed in a somewhat embarrassing position by the two Motions which have been made from the benches opposite. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay) has given us an interesting account of the general state of feeling which pervades those benches. There is a proverb familiar to all of us, which I shall not quote, as to the locality where one should wash one's dirty linen. There might be a controversy whether that operation should take place in private or in public; but I think there can be no doubt that our political dirty linen should, if possible, not be washed in the House of Commons. I heard with great regret the causes of those misunderstandings between the two sections opposite, which hitherto have only been the subject of rumour. Now, that they have been mentioned I would suggest that instead of bringing them under our consideration, there should rather be some meeting held at some other place sufficiently public, where an arrangement might be made to the general satisfaction of the supporters of the Government. Let there be another meeting, for example, at Willis's Rooms. I did not myself expect that in the course of one short year a repetition of such an assemblage would have been necessary; but though annual Parliaments are out of fashion, these annual assemblies appear to be necessary to the maintenance of party discipline among the supporters of the Government. It is to be observed that it is not from questions of high political importance, which concern the public interest and which affect public opinion, that these unhappy misconceptions seem to arise. There is some diminished confidence on the part of the Gentlemen below the gangway, who always style themselves, and I suppose are entitled to be called, the "great Liberal party." There is some diminution of confidence on their part towards Her Majesty's Ministers, not because the question of Parliamentary reform has not been carried to a successful issue, not because church rates have not been abolished, not because that promising programme of administration which was held forth to the admiring gaze of the country a year ago has not been accomplished,—no, it is not in such great questions that these deplorable misunderstandings appear to have their origin, but rather in the absence of that interchange of courtesy, and that general blandness of demeanour to be expected by those who support the Government from those whom they retain in office. In these days, Sir, when an Emperor has not been ashamed of confessing that he is a parvenu, I am sure the "great Liberal party" will permit me to remind them, without offence, that they themselves are of a rather modern origin, and that, like all great Powers in similar circumstances, they are gifted with a peculiar sensitiveness and a prompt susceptibility which, with a view to success in life, it would be wise on their part to curb. But, whatever may be the cause of the position in which we are placed to-night, I must remind the House that the question before us is a very serious one, and that much depends upon the manner in which we encounter it. We are asked to decide upon the conduct of the House of Lords with respect to a recent transaction upon which I need not dwell, and we are invited to do so in no measured language, and in a Resolution which lays down a very distinct and definite policy. I have listened with great attention to the speeches of both the Ministers who have addressed us in this debate. The noble Viscount the Prime Minister only made a suggestion, by which he himself and his friends might be extricated from an awkward position; but the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave reasons why we should support the suggestion which was made by his chief. The suggestion of the Prime Minister was, that the House should give no opinion upon the Motion made by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone; but the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in support of that suggestion was, in fact, a speech which offered a variety of reasons why we should oppose the Resolution before us. What is that Resolution? We are asked to declare in the most formal manner:—

"That the rejection by the House of Lords of the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duties is an encroachment on the rights and privileges of the House of Commons; and it is therefore incumbent upon this House to adopt a practical measure for the vindication of its rights and privileges."

That subject, Sir, has been already under the solemn consideration of the House. The leader of the House proposed three Resolutions upon it, which it is his pride and boast were unanimously supported. Why? Because this House must have thought that they were Resolutions which dealt adequately with the subject. That, at least, was the impression that influenced me in giving my vote, and I believe every hon. Gentleman on this side of the House. Those Resolutions asserted the privileges of the House in a manner so complete that even the noble Member for Marylebone says he is perfectly ready to rest his description of our privileges on the language of the first Resolution. Why, then, does he propose another? The Resolution of the Prime Minister asserted our right to originate Supply in this House. The Resolution of the noble Member for Marylebone asserts "That the rejection by the House of Lords of the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duties is an encroachment on the rights and privileges of the House of Commons." But what was the second Resolution of the Prime Minister? It was an acknowledgment of the right of the Lords to reject such Bills. The Resolution of the noble Member for Marylebone proceeds to say that it is incumbent on us to adopt a practical measure to vindicate our rights and privileges. Sir, I maintain that we have taken adequate and proper measures to assert our rights and privileges, and, therefore, I cannot agree to the Resolution of the noble Member for Marylebone on either of these heads. What is the course we have been counselled to take under these circumstances? On a previous occasion I supported the noble Lord at the head of the Government in the line he recommended, after, of course, due consideration with his colleagues, the House to adopt; and if I were to support a Resolution like the one now before the House, I should stultify everything to which I agreed previously; for, were this Resolution carried it would counteract all the effect of the Resolutions we passed at the instance of the Prime Minister. But what is now recommended by the Government? I was here, and every Gentleman who sits on this side is here, to support the Government in the policy which they had themselves counselled the House to adopt, and which this House, in a generous and confiding spirit, unanimously adopted at their instance; but is that constitutional, and, as I think, adequate settlement of the question, and all that we have done, to be erased and blotted out because an intemperate Resolution is proposed by the noble Member for Marylebone, and because it may suit the convenience of some Member of the Cabinet not to meet the Resolution by a direct negative? Sir, I think that the honour and dignity of the House of Commons—I will say the honour and dignity of the Ministry—require that we should stand by the three Resolutions which we passed as an adequate and constitutional settlement of the question in controversy; and that we should not weaken the position we then assumed. If, indeed, the Government were acting on that unwise counsel given some days ago, and were prepared for "action," then we should have, of course, their proposition before us, and we should consider the measure they might recommend; but I thought, after what occurred last night—after the temperate and wise measures which the Government then brought forward—that the Government had felt on due counsel that it was not for them to reopen a controversy which at one moment was menacing, and that they were satisfied that they had taken that temperate and constitutional course which had recommended, and still recommends, I believe, their conduct to all men of moderate and sound opinions in the country. I think that there is no other course to take but a straightforward one in the present instance, and disapproving the Resolution moved by the noble Member for Marylebone, I feel bound to meet it with a direct and unhesitating negative. We occupy no ambiguous position, which may render it necessary or convenient to us to take refuge in the shabbiest of all Motions that can be made. There are, no doubt, occasions when the Motion of the "Previous Question" may be convenient to the House; but when a question of constitutional interest, concerning the privileges and attributes of both Houses of Parliament, is before us—which question has been recently discussed in all its branches—I think we should be taking a course which the country would never approve, if on this occasion, influenced by none of those reasons which may exercise an influence on other individuals, we take refuge in tortuous conduct and ambiguous language, and did not now uphold that policy which we have hitherto maintained on this question, and offer to the Government, if they are willing to meet the Resolution of the noble Member for Marylebone, that direct support that we have extended to them throughout the whole of this controversy. We ought not to mix ourselves up with a course which, I am sure, the country will never approve, and which no man of spirit, who thoroughly disapproves of the Resolution of the Member for Marylebone, can in his calmer moments look to with any feelings of satisfaction. I am far from wishing that any division should take place which should give anything like a party triumph to Gentlemen on this side on account of the unfortunate dissensions which I trust will now soon pass away, among Gentlemen opposite. There is no reason why the noble Lord at the head of the Government should persist in this Motion of the "Previous Question," which under the circumstances is unusual and unjustifiable, and which, on reflection, I think, he can hardly himself sanction. I feel persuaded that there is at present in the House an overwhelming majority which will support him, if with consistency and spirit he maintains the principles with respect to this question of privilege which he has himself appealed to the House of Commons to assist him in upholding. I trust, therefore, that the noble Lord will drop that unfortunate proposition of the "Previous Question," and meet the Resolution of the noble Member for Marylebone with a direct negative.

Mr. Disraeli

SIR GEORGE GREY observed that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) had placed a construction on the Motion of his noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) to which it was not justly liable. The right hon. Gentleman assumed that his noble Friend wished to evade the question, and leave in uncertainty the expression of the opinion of the House as to the course which had been taken by the House of Lords; but the motive which had actuated his noble Friend in moving the Previous Question was a desire to rest upon the Resolutions which had already been adopted by this House, and maintain the position in which the House then stood in regard to them.

LORD FERMOY, in reply, denied that his Resolution went no further than those of the noble Lord. The Motion stated that the privileges of this House had been invaded, which the noble Lord had not set forth; and this was followed up by the declaration that the House ought to take some action which would compel the Ministry to propose a practical measure. He was placed in a position of some difficulty by the Amendment which had been moved, but he should, at all events, take the first step towards attaining his object by voting against the Previous Question.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE moved the adjournment of the Debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON thought the House had better come to a decision at once upon the Question.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," put, and negatived.

Previous Question put, "That that Question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes 138; Noes 177: Majority 39.

VOLUNTEERS (IRELAND).—LEAVE.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he felt that he should have to struggle against the opposition of Her Majesty's Government, backed by all the long-existing prejudices and groundless alarms of those English Members who, in the plenitude of their ignorance of Ireland, believed that any attempt to put Irishmen in possession of their national and political rights was fraught with danger to the Constitution, and that neither their loyalty nor their discretion would admit of any portion of them being trusted with arms. The question before the House was neither a religious nor a political one: the Government wished to render it both. It related solely to material Irish interests—possibly to Irish national existence. He did not attach blame to the Government, nor mean to accuse them of a slight to Ireland for not themselves bringing forward a Bill similar to that he was about to ask leave to introduce. It was well known that they were not favourable to the Volunteer movement in this country, and would, had they been able to do so, have crushed it in the bud. Public feeling as to the necessity of preparing for self-defence was too strong for them. They were not only forced to sanction, but compelled to assist in the movement. Rifle corps are now formed throughout Great Britain. With the sanction of the Executive Government, 140,000 are enrolled, and a sense of security has been created through the length and breadth of the land. The formation of a Rifle corps has been sanctioned in the Isle of Man; from Ireland alone is this privilege withheld. Up to the present time he did not consider Government was imperatively called on to take any direct step; the necessity for doing so did not arise until the subject was seriously taken up by the Irish people. The time, however, has arrived. The number of effectives who have already enrolled themselves with the Working Committee, at Dublin, up to Friday, the 13th of July, 1860, is five hundred men. This does not include a large number who are engaged in forming corps in the suburbs, estimated, on Saturday last, to amount to three hundred. Nor does it include the gentlemen of the Civil Service, who wished to form an exclusive corps in the first instance, but whom the working committee expect to enrol, to the number of about three hundred. And the University can turn out seven hundred. In addition to these figures, the Committee have received assurances from the heads of several monster houses in Dublin, that they will equip the young men in their employment, should the sanction of the Government be obtained, and allow a Saturday half-holiday for drill—the number estimated to be, at least, one thousand men. The banks of Dublin are not included in the foregoing estimate, but the committee have learned with certainty that their employés will join the movement, some twenty having been enrolled on Saturday.

[The hon. Gentleman here read a letter from the Secretary of the Rifle Volunteers in Dublin, showing the numbers who have desired to enrol their names.]

The offer made by the Civil Service in Dublin to enrol themselves, as has been done here and in Edinburgh, was refused to be accepted, in a letter signed by General Larcom, assigning as a reason that, though the Lord Lieutenant can sanction the embodiment of such corps, by the 42nd Geo. III., cap. 68, the Government have not the power to make rules and regulations for the enrolment and organization of Volunteers in Ireland. Such, however, he had from high legal authority was not the fact, as, by the common law of the land, Her Majesty could accept the services of her subjects under any conditions and legal forms it was her pleasure to adopt; but, as the opinion of the Irish Attorney General, given in reply to a question put by him (Colonel French), appeared to countenance the existence of a legal difficulty, his object in asking leave to introduce his Bill was to remove that impediment. He sought solely to assimilate the law in both countries, to render legal and allowable in Ireland what was now legal and allowable in Great Britain; and he could not see any just grounds on which Government could object to such a course. He sought not to pledge Ministers either to sanction or assist in the formation of Irish Volunteer Corps, but solely to enable them to form, with the sanction of Government, if that sanction was obtained. By hesitating to give their assent to a measure such as this, what were they doing? They were pointing out to Europe that Ireland was the weakest and least to be depended on portion of the Empire, and doing all in their power, should hostilities arise between England and any of the Great Powers, to subject us to an invasion.

Colonel French

What was the position in which Ireland would be placed by them, in the event of an invasion of England? As a matter of necessity, all the troops of the Line would be withdrawn from Ireland, and, probably, our 13,000 police force, as it is paid from the Consolidated Fund, would also be called for. Ireland would have to depend on about 40,000 disembodied Militia, if they could be got together. You tell the Continental nations you will neither defend us nor permit us to organize a force for our own defence; that Ireland is the country to invade—"Hit the Irish hard; they have no friends." Notwithstanding all this, my reliance on the loyalty and courage of our people is such, that I confidently assert an invading army will receive in Ireland nothing but hard blows, and that they would not bring away from their shores alive a single man of their force. Volunteer Corps in Ireland, from the expenses of the outfit and other causes, would necessarily only be capable of being formed in our large towns, and, in addition to the assistance they would afford in repelling an invading army, be of the utmost service in rendering those towns places of security for the lives and properties of persons resident in the counties. They would serve as an effectual check in cases of disturbances against bodies of ill-disposed persons, who, in all countries, in cases of invasion, congregate solely for plunder. But even this Her Majesty's Government are not disposed to allow us.

The objections that have been made to the formation of a Volunteer force in Ireland are threefold:—

1st. That the movement would be a sectarian one; that the regiments would be exclusively composed of Protestants. Such, however, would not be the case. Take the chief towns in each of the provinces, and see how it would stand. If Dublin turned out 10,000 men, one half, at least, would be Catholics. Belfast would, he admitted, have a force chiefly Presbyterians; but Cork and Galway would have a very large proportion of Catholics.

The second objection was leaving arms in their possession—an objection which could not arise, as in Ireland, as it was in England, the arms would be retained in the depôts, and only used at the time of drill.

The third objection was that, from religious differences, bloodshed must ensue, from bringing together masses of Protestants and Catholics. His answer to this was, that the very reverse would be the case; that doing so would enable the people to know and esteem each other, as was the case in the embodiment of the Militia; and that it would tend to put an end to those party collisions which were a disgrace to any civilized country. Had it not been for the policy of the Government, so long and so pertinaciously continued, of dividing the Irish people, such a scene as that which has lately occurred at Lurgan would never have taken place. How long was this distrust of Ireland to continue? How long was this system of separating classes and religions to be fostered? By it you have long paralyzed the right arm of England; and he trusted his noble Friend at the head of the Government would not be influenced, by the weakness and want of political foresight of the Chief Governor of Ireland, to suffer it to continue. The loyalty, the determined courage, the physical strength of the Irish people, would enable them to repel any invader. They feared not the power of France; what they were apprehensive of was, the timidity of Government, who objected to allow them the means of preparation accorded to every other part of the kingdom; who were weakening the United Kingdom, and insulting the Irish Nation.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That leave be given to bring in a Bill to extend to Ireland all powers to make rules and regulations for the enrolment and organization of Volunteer Corps which are now by Law applicable to Great Britain.”

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that if the Government had thought that on the whole the formation of Rifle Corps in Ireland was desirable they would themselves have brought in a Bill; but for various reasons which he had had the honour to state the other evening, they did not think it was expedient, and therefore they could not agree to the Motion. It was not from any distrust of the Irish people that they took this course; neither was it because the Government doubted the perfect readiness of Irish Volunteers to fight. The fear was rather that in the absence of an external enemy they might indulge themselves in encounters which would not be exactly sham fights.

COLONEL DICKSON observed that every Irishman must regret to hear his countrymen spoken of in the way they had been spoken of by the noble Lord. The noble Lord laboured under a great mistake in thinking there would be danger of their fighting amongst themselves.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he must beg leave to differ from the opinion of the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon (Colonel French). He was not prepared to say that he would support a Motion which would only arm certain persons in the North of Ireland, and create a distinction he should not like to see.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, the question was one of great importance; and as it was likely to lead to much discussion he would move that the House do adjourn.

Motion made, and Question put, “That this House do now adjourn.”

The House divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 28: Majority 33.

House adjourned at half after
Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, July 18, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Spirit Duties; Census (Scotland); Excise Duties.
2° Coroners (No. 3); Hackney Carriages (Metropolis) Act Amendment.
3° Medical Act (1858) Amendment; Copyhold and Inclosure Commissions, &c.; Turnpike Trusts Arrangements; Highway Rates Act Continuance; Oxford University (No. 2).

CORONERS (No. 3) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COBBETT said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill. He had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis) would have given some explanation of what he intended to do with his Bill, or that he would have withdrawn it altogether. [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: It is postponed.] He would ask the House to read his Bill a second time, and go into Committee pro forma, in order to enable him to introduce Amendments. He had on a former occasion stated his reasons for bringing in the Bill. Its principle had been recognized by the Commission of 1849. That Commission recommended that an Act should be passed to provide that coroners should be paid by salary instead of by fee, and the reason given by them was the same which guided the Committee which sat during the present Session—namely, that in several counties of England conflicts had arisen between the magistrates and coroners, which was, to say the least of it, very unseemly, and might lead to still more serious consequences. The former disallowed many of the fees which the latter were entitled to charge, and thus practically diminished, to a considerable extent, the number of inquisitions. Now, that was a state of things which ought to be put an end to in some way or another. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had a Bill before the House, giving to coroners, who had their fees disallowed by magistrates, an opportunity of seeking their remedy by a case to be submitted to the justices of the Court of Queen's Bench; but all lawyers were of opinion that that Bill would not answer the purpose for which it was intended. The Bill which he (Mr. Cobbett) had introduced early in the year was framed in conformity with the recommendations of the Committee which sat this Session, and if the House now allowed the Bill to be read a second time, they might go into Committee pro forma, which would advance it a stage, and would also enable him to bring it up on some future and early day in a more perfect shape. His own Bill had been introduced early in the Session, and a Committee, moved for by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Edwin James) had sat to inquire into the facts of the case. The Committee took evidence, and received ample proof that there should be such a Bill as had been recommended by the Commission; and the present measure carried out as strictly as possible the recommendations of both. Some of these recommendations, however, were of a minor character; it was doubtful whether they were altogether practicable, and he thought it advisable, after a good deal of correspondence and inquiry, to expunge such clauses from the Bill. There were fifteen counties in which fees which the coroners thought themselves entitled to charge were disallowed; the greater number being in Durham, Hants, and Stafford. In Hants, according to the statement of Mr. Todd, of Winchester, the inquisitions held by him had been reduced from one hundred and sixty to about thirty-two; and the localities where the case of sudden or suspicious death occurred in which no inquest had taken place were much dissatisfied. The magistrates, having practically control of the police, had instructed them to furnish him with information in so few cases that he had no doubt deaths took place in a suspicious manner where he was not called upon at all to act. The Committee had similar evidence from other quarters. In Middlesex there was a strong belief on the part of the coroner that one particular species of crime—child murder—was greatly on the increase. Several other witnesses who came before the Committee gave similar testimony, and this it was which had prompted him from the first to take the part he had done on this question. He had seen a great deal in the course of his own practice, which had convinced him of the great usefulness of the coroner's court in checking crime. Those who might feel themselves safe in committing crimes, if there were no such thing as a coroner's court and jury, were in constant dread of that institution. Among the other modes in which the crime of murder was committed was one which was obviously increasing—namely, by secret poisoning. One could scarcely take up a newspaper without seeing a case of suspected or proved murder by poisoning. He could not help thinking that the magistrates throughout the country had been scared without cause by finding that the cost of inquests had been greatly increased of late years, which they attributed erroneously to the misconduct of the coroners. Successive Acts of the Legislature had rendered it inevitable that the cost should increase. In 1836 an Act was passed giving power to the coroners to have post-mortem examinations made—a most useful Act, which had been the means of bringing to light some of the foulest murders ever committed, but imposing on the coroner the necessity of paying two guineas to a surgeon for making each post-mortem examination, and one guinea to any surgeon called as a witness. In 1836 or 1837 the Registration Act greatly increased the number of inquests. Those two Acts taken together had increased the expenses by about one-half. In 1837 an Act was procured by the Poor Law Commissioners forbidding the expenses of the coroners to be taken, as they had previously been, out of the poor's rate, and making it imperative that the justices should pay them out of the county rate. The magistrates in several places had begun to refuse to pay the coroners' expenses in various cases, which course had led to disputes between the justices and the coroners, and in some places to an almost total discontinuance of the practice of holding inquests, except in some very strong cases of suspicion. He did not mean to cast any reflection upon the magistrates, who were no doubt anxious to do their duty in saving the county rates. But if that were done in an indiscreet manner, it might end in increasing the rates, by leading to expensive prosecutions, as well as by leading to the encouragement of crime. But in the counties in which magistrates interfered coroners were almost abandoning their offices. Mr. Hills, one of the coroners for Kent, told him the other day that, though he was informed that upon two consecutive days two children had been smothered in the same house, he held no inquest. The coroner might have acted wrongly in that instance, but the magistrates were to blame for not requiring inquests to be held in such cases. To prevent such collisions and difficulties for the future, he moved that the Bill be read a second time.

Mr. Cobbett

MR. DEEDES said, he wished to second the Motion, because he was desirous that all the disputes between coroners and magistrates should be brought to a conclusion. He was sorry that the hon. and learned Gentleman had referred to cases which had occurred in Kent. He had never shrunk from the investigation of those cases. No directions had been given to the coroner which, properly considered, could interfere with the discharge of his duties; and he had no hesitation in saying that in the instances mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman inquests ought to have been held, and that the expense of holding them would have been allowed by the magistrates.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it seemed to be generally admitted that the present state of things with regard to the office of coroner demanded remedy. Questions had arisen in various counties between coroners and magistrates for which at present there seemed no satisfactory mode of solution. The Bill which he had introduced, and which had been postponed, had for its object, while maintaining the mode of payment by fees, to provide for the decision of disputes between magistrates and coroners, by an application to the Queen's Bench. The question was investigated by a Select Committee this Session, whose opinion was that it was not desirable to attempt to amend the present system, but entirely to alter it, and to remunerate the coroner by salary. He had considerable doubts at first as to the expediency of that change, but if it were the general wish of the House that the experiment should be tried he was willing to acquiesce in the adoption of that course, provided that the rest of the institution should be made to harmonize with that mode of payment. At present the coroner was elected by the freeholders. The tenure of the office was freehold, and he could only be removed by a judicial proceeding before the Lord Chancellor. In point of fact he was irremovable, and the only security for his proper discharge of his duties was his being paid by fees. If that security were, by the substitution of a salary, withdrawn, it would be desirable to give to the Crown some power of removing from his office a coroner who was unfit for, or negligent in, the discharge of his duties. It was also a matter well deserving of consideration whether the office—which, though frequently called a judicial one, partook more of the nature of one of police—should continue to be an elective one. These elections often led to contests which partook of a political character, involved great expense, and caused the successful candidate to enter upon his office burdened with debt—a most unfavourable position for any one who had judicial duties to perform. He would suggest that it might be desirable to confide the appointment of coroners to the Lords-Lieutenant of counties, who were persons of consideration and of interest in the counties, and included within their ranks men of all political opinions. He doubted the expediency of limiting the selection of coroners' juries to the list of county jurors, and thought that it might perhaps be expedient to diminish the number of jurors. There was not, that he was aware, any magic in the number twelve, and he believed that a smaller number would be sufficient to conduct these inquiries. He should be prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill; but he hoped that his hon. and learned Friend would take these remarks into consideration, and in the Amendments which he intended to introduce into his Bill adopt such of the suggestions as he thought were well founded.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he was glad to find that the evils now experienced in connection with the office of coroner were about to be remedied, but he doubted whe-

should be passed to provide that coroners should be paid by salary instead of by fee, and the reason given by them was the same which guided the Committee which sat during the present Session—namely, that in several counties of England conflicts had arisen between the magistrates and coroners, which was, to say the least of it, very unseemly, and might lead to still more serious consequences. The former disallowed many of the fees which the latter were entitled to charge, and thus practically diminished, to a considerable extent, the number of inquisitions. Now, that was a state of things which ought to be put an end to in some way or another. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had a Bill before the House, giving to coroners, who had their fees disallowed by magistrates, an opportunity of seeking their remedy by a case to be submitted to the justices of the Court of Queen's Bench; but all lawyers were of opinion that that Bill would not answer the purpose for which it was intended. The Bill which he (Mr. Cobbett) had introduced early in the year was framed in conformity with the recommendations of the Committee which sat this Session, and if the House now allowed the Bill to be read a second time, they might go into Committee pro forma, which would advance it a stage, and would also enable him to bring it up on some future and early day in a more perfect shape. His own Bill had been introduced early in the Session, and a Committee, moved for by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Edwin James) had sat to inquire into the facts of the case. The Committee took evidence, and received ample proof that there should be such a Bill as had been recommended by the Commission; and the present measure carried out as strictly as possible the recommendations of both. Some of these recommendations, however, were of a minor character; it was doubtful whether they were altogether practicable, and he thought it advisable, after a good deal of correspondence and inquiry, to expunge such clauses from the Bill. There were fifteen counties in which fees which the coroners thought themselves entitled to charge were disallowed; the greater number being in Durham, Hants, and Stafford. In Hants, according to the statement of Mr. Todd, of Winchester, the inquisitions held by him had been reduced from one hundred and sixty to about thirty-two; and the localities where the case of sudden or suspicious

Mr. Cobbett

death occurred in which no inquest had taken place were much dissatisfied. The magistrates, having practically control of the police, had instructed them to furnish him with information in so few cases that he had no doubt deaths took place in a suspicious manner where he was not called upon at all to act. The Committee had similar evidence from other quarters. In Middlesex there was a strong belief on the part of the coroner that one particular species of crime—child murder—was greatly on the increase. Several other witnesses who came before the Committee gave similar testimony, and this it was which had prompted him from the first to take the part he had done on this question. He had seen a great deal in the course of his own practice, which had convinced him of the great usefulness of the coroner's court in checking crime. Those who might feel themselves safe in committing crimes, if there were no such thing as a coroner's court and jury, were in constant dread of that institution. Among the other modes in which the crime of murder was committed was one which was obviously increasing—namely, by secret poisoning. One could scarcely take up a newspaper without seeing a case of suspected or proved murder by poisoning. He could not help thinking that the magistrates throughout the country had been scared without cause by finding that the cost of inquests had been greatly increased of late years, which they attributed erroneously to the misconduct of the coroners. Successive Acts of the Legislature had rendered it inevitable that the cost should increase. In 1836 an Act was passed giving power to the coroners to have post-mortem examinations made—a most useful Act, which had been the means of bringing to light some of the foulest murders ever committed, but imposing on the coroner the necessity of paying two guineas to a surgeon for making each post-mortem examination, and one guinea to any surgeon called as a witness. In 1836 or 1837 the Registration Act greatly increased the number of inquests. Those two Acts taken together had increased the expenses by about one-half. In 1837 an Act was procured by the Poor Law Commissioners forbidding the expenses of the coroners to be taken, as they had previously been, out of the poor's rate, and making it imperative that the justices should pay them out of the county rate. The magistrates in several places had begun to refuse to pay the coroners' expenses in various cases, which course had led to disputes between the justices and the coroners, and in some places to an almost total discontinuance of the practice of holding inquests, except in some very strong cases of suspicion. He did not mean to cast any reflection upon the magistrates, who were no doubt anxious to do their duty in saving the county rates. But if that were done in an indiscreet manner, it might end in increasing the rates, by leading to expensive prosecutions, as well as by leading to the encouragement of crime. But in the counties in which magistrates interfered coroners were almost abandoning their offices. Mr. Hills, one of the coroners for Kent, told him the other day that, though he was informed that upon two consecutive days two children had been smothered in the same house, he held no inquest. The coroner might have acted wrongly in that instance, but the magistrates were to blame for not requiring inquests to be held in such cases. To prevent such collisions and difficulties for the future, he moved that the Bill be read a second time.

MR. DEEDES said, he wished to second the Motion, because he was desirous that all the disputes between coroners and magistrates should be brought to a conclusion. He was sorry that the hon. and learned Gentleman had referred to cases which had occurred in Kent. He had never shrunk from the investigation of those cases. No directions had been given to the coroner which, properly considered, could interfere with the discharge of his duties; and he had no hesitation in saying that in the instances mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman inquests ought to have been held, and that the expense of holding them would have been allowed by the magistrates.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it seemed to be generally admitted that the present state of things with regard to the office of coroner demanded remedy. Questions had arisen in various counties between coroners and magistrates for which at present there seemed no satisfactory mode of solution. The Bill which he had introduced, and which had been postponed, had for its object, while maintaining the mode of payment by fees, to provide for the decision of disputes between magistrates and coroners, by an application to the Queen's Bench. The question was investigated by a Select Committee this Session, whose opinion was that it was not desirable to attempt to amend the present system, but entirely to alter it, and to remunerate the coroner by salary. He had considerable doubts at first as to the expediency of that change, but if it were the general wish of the House that the experiment should be tried he was willing to acquiesce in the adoption of that course, provided that the rest of the institution should be made to harmonize with that mode of payment. At present the coroner was elected by the freeholders. The tenure of the office was freehold, and he could only be removed by a judicial proceeding before the Lord Chancellor. In point of fact he was irremovable, and the only security for his proper discharge of his duties was his being paid by fees. If that security were, by the substitution of a salary, withdrawn, it would be desirable to give to the Crown some power of removing from his office a coroner who was unfit for, or negligent in, the discharge of his duties. It was also a matter well deserving of consideration whether the office—which, though frequently called a judicial one, partook more of the nature of one of police—should continue to be an elective one. These elections often led to contests which partook of a political character, involved great expense, and caused the successful candidate to enter upon his office burdened with debt—a most unfavourable position for any one who had judicial duties to perform. He would suggest that it might be desirable to confide the appointment of coroners to the Lords-Lieutenant of counties, who were persons of consideration and of interest in the counties, and included within their ranks men of all political opinions. He doubted the expediency of limiting the selection of coroners' juries to the list of county jurors, and thought that it might perhaps be expedient to diminish the number of jurors. There was not, that he was aware, any magic in the number twelve, and he believed that a smaller number would be sufficient to conduct these inquiries. He should be prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill; but he hoped that his hon. and learned Friend would take these remarks into consideration, and in the Amendments which he intended to introduce into his Bill adopt such of the suggestions as he thought were well founded.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he was glad to find that the evils now experienced in connection with the office of coroner were about to be remedied, but he doubted whether the suggestions as to future appointments was one which the House could adopt. He thought there would be great objection to place the appointment in the hands of Lords-Lieutenant, who each in his county was of decided party politics. He thought it would be better to improve the present mode of election by lessening the expense, and if that attempt did not answer it could be again revised. He was much in favour of the principle of paying coroners by salary instead of fees, but he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that, if that principle were adopted, the institution should be made to harmonize with it.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he thought the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman for the removal of the coroner, should his removal be desirable, a good one, and he was willing to accept it on behalf of the promoters of the Bill, of which he was one. He should have no objection to see a power of control placed in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, who might be empowered to remove the party holding the office in the event of inability from old age to perform its duties, or misbehaviour. He would agree to any such alteration in the system, but as to the other suggestion of altering the rule of election, he trusted the right hon. Gentleman before attempting such an alteration would give the subject very serious consideration. Not merely was it an old office, but it was an office vested in the freeholders, and had in times past been a great safeguard to the liberties of the people. He admitted that it would be well to reduce the expense of election, but he should regret to see the day when the office of coroner would cease to be an object of ambition.

MR. PHILIPPS said, he was not sanguine as to the good effects which were likely to result from the present Bill. If the character of juries was to be raised, he thought their numbers ought to be diminished. The Bill was directed against the restrictions which some magistrates had imposed upon the payment of coroners; but, in his opinion, these disputes were not of sufficient number or magnitude to require the interference of the Legislature. However, he should not oppose the second reading of the Bill.

MR. FARRER said, he should support the second reading. In the county of Durham, which he had the honour to represent, during the last three years 207 inquests had been disallowed in a population of 391,000, and in the West Riding, in a population of 1,325,000, only 378 had been disallowed. It would appear, in fact, that Durham was at the head of the counties in which the disputes between coroners and magistrates prevailed. It was necessary to provide some remedy, and therefore he was very glad to see that the right hon. Home Secretary had given his consent to the second reading. However, he agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Harry Vane) that the appointment to the office ought not to be vested in the Lords-Lieutenant; he thought it would be better to vest it in the county magistrates.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, that if an alteration in the mode of appointment were to be at all made, he would prefer to see the appointment in the hands of the responsible Ministers of the Crown rather than in those of any other parties. On the other hand, if it were determined to maintain the system of election, he would suggest that the electors should be the freeholders on the Parliamentary register—a mode which would preserve the old elective system, and at the same time save it from being, as it now practically was, a mockery and a delusion. He would further suggest that the power given by the Bill to a Judge in the Court of Queen's Bench to direct an inquest to be held should be given to the Judge of any superior court.

MR. JOHN LOCKE suggested that the elective system in connection with the office should be preserved, but that the electors should be not the freeholders of the county, but all parties, whether freeholders, leaseholders, or others, who might be on the Parliamentary register.

MR. BRADY suggested that means should be provided in the Bill for paying medical men to prosecute to the utmost the post mortem examinations which circumstances might prove to be required.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, it was very desirable to render the composition of coroners' juries as respectable as possible. Nothing, however, could be more objectionable than to transfer the appointment of coroners to the Lords-Lieutenant of counties. He approved of the proposal for placing the election of coroners in the hands of those whose names appeared in the Parliamentary register. It was exceedingly desirable to reduce the expenses of the election to this office, which were often very large. He trusted that with some Amendments the Bill might be found to work effectively.

Lord Harry Vane

COLONEL STUART said, he also approved of the Bill, but he likewise objected to the suggestion of placing the appointment in the hands of the Lord-Lieutenants of counties. What they wanted was to prevent the office of coroner falling altogether into disuse; but at the same time many of the inquests that were held were altogether unnecessary. For instance, something like 180 inquests were held on the bodies of those who were lost in the Royal Charter; and there was no necessity for so many inquests, as the verdict in one case ought to rule the rest.

MR. RIDLEY submitted that there ought to be a more liberal allowance to the coroner when obliged to go a long distance. The proposed allowance was in his opinion quite insufficient.

MR. HUMBERSTON said, he was opposed to the mode in which coroners were at present elected, and he thought that the appointment should either be made by the Lords-Lieutenant on the magistrates of the county. By which a great saving of money now expended on the elections of those officers might be effected.

Bill read 2^o, and committed; considered in Committee, and reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 271]; re-committed for Friday.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL— COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. SECOND NIGHT.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [11th July].

“ That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair ;” and which Amendment was, to leave out from the word “ That ” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “ this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee.”

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, “ That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

Debate resumed.

MR. STANILAND said, that the character of the measure might be collected from the last clause, which confirmed acts previously done by local authorities. In that respect the Bill was retrospective, and opposed to the general course of legislation. The real object of the Bill was to enable vestries who had incurred expenses in supporting a Bill in reference to the supply of gas to the Metropolis to pay those expenses out of the rates. In that Bill there was a provision to the same effect; but if the Bill should not pass, there would be no means of paying these expenses, which amounted to several thousand pounds. The Bill also provided that it should be competent for any vestry in the Metropolis to appear by council before a Committee of the House, and to take part in supporting or opposing any Bill, and pay the expenses out of the rates. That was an unprecedented power to give to the vestries, and he thought clerks of vestries would be apt to use it to the great advantage of themselves and the detriment of the ratepayers. He trusted, therefore, that the House would agree to the proposal of the hon. Member for Colchester, that the House would go into Committee on the Bill that day three months.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he trusted the House would go into Committee on the Bill. He did not know why the hon. Member (Mr. Staniland) who did not represent any of the places that would be affected by the Bill, should oppose it, except it was that the other evening he came forward as the great champion of the gas companies whose monopoly was threatened by a Bill which had been brought in for this purpose. The provisions of the Bill seemed to be founded on the most fair and equitable principle. The gas companies had great funds at their command, and might inflict great injury upon a Metropolitan parish, and at present the parish had no means whatever of entering into a contest with the companies, inasmuch as they had no funds applicable to such a purpose. The Bill would enable them to raise the funds, and it was a power which he thought they ought to have.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he should support the proposal in the Bill providing for the payment of the expenses incurred by local authorities in protecting the public interests of their districts.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, municipal corporations might resist Bills which interfered with their local authority, if the Court of Chancery said that that was a right application of their funds. But that was not the power which it was proposed to give to every little vestry in the Metropolis, but a power of promoting such Bills as they might fancy were for the benefit of their parish. If the Bill passed, they ought to entitle it, “ a Bill for the benefit of vestry clerks.”

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, that the vestries had been put to great expense in supporting the Gas Bill before the Select Committee of the House of Commons, and it was now proposed to empower the local authorities to levy rates to pay such expense. If the inhabitants of the Metropolis desired to pay money for this purpose, what business had the Member for Boston and the Member for Reading to endeavour to prevent them? The Bill applied to the Metropolis, and not to the whole of the empire. The Corporation of London had the right to appear before Select Committees of that House, and if the Corporation was extended so as to include the whole Metropolis, the hon. Member for Westminster needed not to have introduced this Bill.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the necessity for the Bill arose from the peculiar position of the Metropolis in reference to municipal institutions. He had been reproached many times in the course of the Session with not bringing on the London Corporation Reform Bill. It had been very much against his inclination that that Bill had been so long deferred. A proposition had been made with regard to the creation of a municipality embracing the whole of the Metropolis. Now, when the Bill to amend the Corporation of London was first brought forward, there was no question of that nature debated, and all the House had in view was to accept the present boundaries of the City of London as something definitive, and to improve the constitution of the corporation. The question had since been raised whether it was not possible to abolish the Corporation of the City of London, and to distribute its revenues over the whole Metropolis. That question was one for the consideration of the House, but he confessed he retained the opinion which was expressed in the Report of the London Corporation Commissioners, that London being, as it was sometimes called, a province covered with houses, was not fitted to be constituted into a single municipality, and that it was impossible to constitute it into a single municipality, as Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and other large towns respectively were. His belief was, that the interests of the people living in the east, the west, the north, and the south of London were so discordant, that it would be impossible for them to be represented in a town council, and that the magnitude of the Metropolis was so great as to render the ordinary functions of a municipal government inapplicable as regarded the Metropolis. The Commissioners, although they came to the conclusion that it would not be possible to have a municipality for the whole of London, nevertheless recommended the creation of a Board of Works, with certain limited powers. A measure was introduced by Sir Benjamin Hall on that recommendation, and the Metropolitan Board of Works had been constituted with defined powers extending over the whole of the Metropolis. That was the nearest approach to a municipality for the whole of London which it was possible to make. But then it was true that these great parishes of the Metropolis, many of them of much more importance than large towns in the country, had very important interests, and it was certainly difficult to regard them in the light of ordinary rural parishes. It seemed impossible to divide the Metropolis into municipal districts other than into parishes, and on the other hand it was difficult to deal with parishes as if they were municipal bodies. Municipal boroughs had, he apprehended, a certain power of promoting private Bills, and they all knew that that power had been exercised very extensively by the Corporation of the City of London. The City Remembrancer, indeed, was an officer specially appointed to manage Parliamentary business. Other municipal bodies, such as those of Manchester and Liverpool, had also power to promote or oppose Bills, and he apprehended that if the interests of the town were attacked by a private company they would have the power of appearing before the committee, and the expenses of the contest would be paid out of the borough fund. [Cries of "No."] Well, that might be a doubtful point, but his impression was that, under certain conditions, it was legal to pay such expenses out of the borough fund. The question then arose what should be done with respect to a parish such as Marylebone or Southwark (much more important than a great number of municipal boroughs in the country), when they believed their interests were about to be attacked by a private body. At present they had no legal right to appear before a Parliamentary Committee; and this Bill sought to give them that power. The Bill appeared to give it, certainly, in a very extensive way, and said that the expense might be paid out of any rate whatever raised under the present Bill or under the Metropolitan Local Management Act. He thought that in its present form it was likely to lead to a great increase in the business of promoting and opposing Bills, and it behoved the House not to pass an unguarded measure on this subject. On the other hand, he could not but feel that there was a real defect in the present state of things. Persons often had a substantial interest, which they ought to be permitted to support at the common expense, and if power for that purpose could be given in a sufficient and proper manner he should have no objection to the Bill; but in its present form he regarded it with considerable suspicion. He had no objection, however, to consider the clauses of the Bill in Committee, and he thought at all events that there ought to be some control on the part of the Metropolitan Board of Works, which was the only body extending over the whole of the Metropolis, before expense was incurred by any parish in introducing or opposing a Bill. That would check any tendency to parish jobbing.

Sir Francis Goldsmid

MR. AYRTON said, that the proposition he made at the beginning of the Session, had not been correctly referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. What he proposed was, that in the Metropolis there should be local Corporations, each confined to an appropriate district, for the purpose of managing all matters of detail of a local character; and that there should be another aggregate body composed of representatives from the local bodies, for the purpose of managing those affairs which were of an aggregate character, and applied to the whole Metropolis. With regard to the question before the House, he could not but express his surprise that the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Staniland), who on a former occasion appeared as the acknowledged agent of a number of private companies, should now come forward to obstruct a Bill enabling vestries to protect the interest of the inhabitants of the parishes of London, whenever it was necessary for them to apply to the Houses of Parliament.

MR. SPOONER said, he must deprecate the language used by some hon. Members, when they said that the hon. Members for Colchester and Boston had no business to thrust themselves into a matter of this kind, as they had nothing to do with the Metropolis. That appeared to him to be the enunciation of a new principle, which he did not think ought to be tolerated in Parliament. He always thought that it was one of their greatest privileges not to be the mere representatives of any particular interest, but the interests of the whole kingdom. He, for one, objected to the principle on public grounds. It formed a dangerous precedent, which might soon be applied to other parts of the kingdom. Municipal boroughs could not make a charge upon the inhabitants without the consent of the ratepayers, and there could be no objection to the Bill if such a condition were included in it; but he objected to vestries having the power to tax the inhabitants without their own consent.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, the Metropolis had for years past suffered from one of the most severe and crushing monopolies possible. The inhabitants now wanted power to defend themselves against such a monopoly; but hon. Members seemed inclined neither to let the inhabitants help themselves from the Imperial purse, nor to let them tax themselves for Metropolitan purposes. This was rather hard; but it furnished another instance which went to show that London should be formed into a complete and perfect municipality. He hoped the House would consent to go into Committee on the Bill; the promoters of which would be willing to adopt any reasonable safeguards against the abuse of the power now sought for.

MR. CHILDERS suggested that the power of opposing Bills in Parliament, which these bodies wished for, should be given, on condition that they satisfied the Committee before whom they appeared, that they had good and legitimate grounds of opposition.

MR. F. W. RUSSELL said, that as a ratepayer, he must protest against this most anomalous Bill. If the precedent were once established, there was not a parish in the country which would not have a right to the same privileges.

MR. BRADY said, it was absolutely necessary to protect the public of the Metropolis against the monopolies of companies, and he should support the proposition of the hon. Baronet, the Member for Westminster.

SIR WILLIAM MILES requested the hon. Baronet (Sir John Shelley) to state whether he would adopt the suggestion of the Home Secretary.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he had not the slightest objection to adopt the suggestion of the Home Secretary, and to provide that in every case before any opposition was instituted to a Bill before Parliament, the consent of the Metropolitan Board should be obtained.

[Second Night.]

SIR CHARLES NAPIER observed, that it would have been only candid of the hon. Gentleman, the Member for Limerick (Mr. Russell), to have told the House that he was chairman of the Committee of General Gas Companies.

Question put,

The House divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 68: Majority 10.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 and 2 were agreed to.

Clause 3 (Powers of "Local Authority.")

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that it had been ruled in Committees of that House that no corporation could appear as petitioners against any Bill, other than a canal or railway Bill. Under these circumstances, he thought the words of this clause too wide, as they might be taken to refer any work whatever.

MR. TAVERNER MILLER agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking the wording of the clause too wide, and thought his hon. Friend (Sir John Shelley) ought to propose its postponement, with a view of having it amended.

MR. SPOONER said, he would suggest the words "with the consent of the ratepayers in public meeting assembled." Those words would remove the objection to the clause.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought such a restriction objectionable, as introducing too cumbrous a machinery. A provision, such as that agreed to by his hon. Friend, namely, one making the consent of the Board of Works necessary, would be a sufficient guarantee. Another guarantee might be introduced if the Committee thought it desirable, namely, that the expenses of a Bill should be chargeable on the ratepayers only in the event of the Committee before whom the Bill came being of opinion that they were proper expenses.

MR. JOHN LOCKE objected to making the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works a condition, as there might be an antagonism between that Board and the local authority; and the former might, in their own interest, refuse the assent to opposition.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that the clause as it stood was nearly similar to one in the Metropolis Local Management Act. He should introduce words to carry out the promise which he had made to his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Sir John Shelley

MR. AYRTON moved words to provide that the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works should be necessary in order to enable vestries to appear in Parliament either to promote or oppose a Bill.

Clause, as amended agreed to; as was also Clause 4.

Clause 5 (For Payment of Expenses incurred by Local Authority).

MR. CLAY proposed an Amendment to the effect that all costs should be paid out of a special rate to be levied for the purpose, as he thought it would be improper to allow the sewers rate or other rate to be applied in payment of the costs of litigation.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 37, to leave out from the word "rates," to the end of the Clause, in order to add the words "to be raised under the authority of this Act."

MR. AYRTON said, the effect of the proviso would be, that for an expense, it might be of £50, a special rate would have to be raised in such a parish as Marylebone. It was obvious that this was utterly unwarrantable, as the expense of collection would be far beyond the sum to be raised.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS also opposed the Amendment as impracticable.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he did not understand that it was intended by the Amendment that a special rate should be made for each item of legal expenditure, but that the whole of the expenditure for the year should be paid out of a special rate.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 86; Noes 81: Majority 5.

MR. CHILDERS moved a proviso at the end of the Clause to the effect that the expenses of a local authority in supporting or opposing a Bill in either House of Parliament should not be paid unless the Select Committee were of opinion that such local authority had reasonable cause for appearing before them.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought on further consideration there was no necessity for the proviso. The Select Committee, before they heard a local authority upon a Bill, would have to decide whether they had a locus standi, and a decision in the affirmative would be equivalent to a decision that the expenses of appearing had been properly incurred. The proviso therefore would be mere surplusage.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, the opposition to the Bill was very inflated—he would not say with gas, although it did so happen that nearly every hon. Member who opposed the Bill was connected with a gas company.

MR. HARDY said, he believed that there might be many cases where parties had a technical locus standi, but had no reasonable ground for opposition. He admitted that the Committee would only interfere in some case of gross abuse; but these were exactly the cases where protection to the rate-payers was required.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he adhered to his opinion that the words were unnecessary, but he would not oppose their insertion.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that it was very necessary that there should be some check or control on the part of the rate-payers upon the legal costs and charges which might be incurred. He thought that as a proper check on the vestry clerk, who incurred expenses on the ratepayers, there should be a power of taxation, and he, therefore, proposed to insert at the end of the clause the following words:—

“Provided always that before the payment of the costs and charges by the parochial authority such costs and charges shall be taxed by the taxing officer of either House of Parliament.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; as were also the other Clauses of the Bill, with the exception of Clause 7, which, on the Motion of Sir John Shelley was struck out.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS.—INLAND PROMISSORY NOTES.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee of Ways and Means.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee).

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the following Resolution:—

“That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged and paid for and upon every Promissory Note made in the United Kingdom for the payment of any sum of Money exceeding £4,000, now chargeable with the Stamp Duty of £2 5s., the following rate of Stamp Duty in lieu of the said duty now chargeable thereon (that is to say); for every £1,000 or part of £1,000 of the Money thereby made payable the Duty of Ten Shillings.”

Resolution agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

And it being Six of the Clock, Mr. SPEAKER adjourned the House till To-morrow, without putting the Question.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, July 19, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Medical Act (1858) Amendment; Copyhold and Inclosure Commissions, &c.; Turnpike Trusts Arrangements; Highway Rates Act Continuance; Oxford University (No. 2).

2nd Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (1845) Amendment; Registration of Births, &c., (Scotland); Court of Queen's Bench Act Amendment; Census (England); Census (Ireland); Inclosure (No. 2).

LABOURERS' COTTAGES (SCOTLAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, in moving that the House resolve itself into Committee on this Bill, which had received the unanimous sanction of the other House of Parliament, said that the condition of many of the cottages in Scotland evinced the necessity for a measure of this description. In numerous instances, from want of the necessary accommodation, labourers, married and single, were huddled together. The increased prosperity of the country and the reclamation of lands, which had taken place on a large scale of late years, added to the importance of legislating on this question. He hoped their Lordships would pass without delay a measure of so much value to the best interests of Scotland. Provisions had been introduced to guard against the creation of permanent charges on the estate, where the objects to be attained were not likely to prove permanently beneficial.

Moved, That this House do resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, he would not oppose the Motion for going into Committee on the Bill, but thought it would require some important Amendments, similar to those which had been made in the Erection of Labourers' Cottages in Ireland Bill, which provided for the payment of the charge on estates by instalments within the period of twenty-five years; whereas under the present Bill three-fourths of the amount borrowed was to be charged on the estate. The effect of making a permanent charge on estates for the purpose of erecting cottages would, he was afraid, be a very bad one, and they might hereafter find heirs succeeding to estates, the whole value of which had been swallowed up in mortgages imposed for the purpose of raising money to build cottages.

LORD REDESDALE said, that when the Bill went into Committee he should move the insertion of a clause providing for the repayment of the money advanced, such repayment to be made by instalments, and the whole amount of the money to be refunded within twenty-five years.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY supported the Bill. The cottages in Scotland were, he said, in many cases of a very inferior description, and there was often only one sleeping place for a single family. This was the source of very great demoralization; and he could not conceive any object of greater national importance than to give facilities to landlords to improve the cottages on their estates. He might add, that there was a great desire on the part of the country population for those improvements, and farmers were becoming very loath to take farms where the cottages for the labourers were inadequate.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH also hoped the Bill would be committed. If noble Lords imagined that the cottages in Scotland were of the same description with those in Wiltshire, they were very much mistaken. From the immense tracts of land that of late years had been taken into cultivation in Scotland there were large districts where there were very few cottages at all, and many of those that did exist were of a very dilapidated description. Having had some experience of this matter himself, he could assure their Lordships that the facilities provided by this Bill were much needed in Scotland, and he did not think it would tempt any one to speculate in cottage building.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

LANDS CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT (1845) AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that the 5th clause would give the Secretary of State for War power to take lands by the well-known machinery of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which he had already the power to take under the Defences Act.

The Marquess of Bath

LORD REDESDALE said, he had no objection to the Bill as it was originally drawn; but their Lordships would observe that as it stood now there was a great difference between the 4th and 5th Clauses. By the 4th Clause cities and corporations were empowered to obtain land by agreement, but the 5th Clause gave the Admiralty and the Ordnance power to obtain land compulsorily. This was a very dangerous power to entrust even to the Government; in point of fact, it would give the Ordnance the right to compel a sale of Mount Edgecumbe for the defence of Plymouth.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET explained that the power given to the Admiralty was inserted in the Bill at the request of a Member of the late Board, and not at the instance of the present Board. When it was referred to him he understood that it was merely giving the Admiralty the facilities of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, when they had obtained lands by agreement, and he was informed that that was the correct interpretation of the clause; but as it seemed to him that under the clause, as it now stood, the Admiralty might take any lands, whether adjoining the sea or belonging to private persons in an inland county, he should have no objection in Committee to limit the right to taking lands by agreement. The Bill did not give any new power to the Ordnance or War Department beyond the powers they already possessed under the Defences Act. It only gave them new machinery.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, there could be no doubt that, as far as the Admiralty was concerned, a new and very formidable power would be given by the clause as it now stood; but the assurance of the noble Duke that the Admiralty should merely have power to take lands by agreement was perfectly satisfactory.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY objected to additional power being given to the Board of Ordnance in a direction where it was so liable to abuse.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON explained that, while this Bill conferred on the Board of Admiralty the power which it did not at present possess of acquiring land compulsorily, it did not confer additional power on the War Department. That Department already had it in its power to take land under the Defences Act, subject to a certificate signed by the Lord Lieutenant or by two Deputy Lieutenants of the county. As the Defences Act was passed in 1842, when there was no excitement or immediate apprehension of war, it was not likely to contain any provisions which were not necessary for the defence of the country; and it had been occasionally enforced down to the present time. Looking to the necessity of increasing our national defences at the present moment, it was possible that they might require to call the Act into more frequent operation than formerly, and the object of the Amendment was not to give them additional power, but to enable them to drop a machinery which had been found defective and inconvenient.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

PARLIAMENTARY BUSINESS.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, we have now arrived at the third week of July, a period when it is generally hoped that the Session is drawing to a close. On former occasions the review of the Session has often been made the subject of an exciting political controversy, and I am far from saying that the present Session is so far an exception to the general rule as not to afford ample material for debate. But on the present occasion it is my desire not to seek, but sedulously to avoid, anything approaching to a party discussion. I wish solely to draw your Lordships' attention, as a matter of dry detail, to a state of things which is a matter of great importance not only to the country, as affecting the character of the legislation of both Houses, but also to the interests of any and every Government which happens to be charged with the responsibility of office. I trust, therefore, we may approach the consideration of the question without the slightest reference to party feeling, and merely as a subject in which we all have a great and common interest. The state of things is this:—We have now been sitting for the space of twenty-six weeks, and at the expiration of that time I find that thirty-four Acts of Parliament have received the Royal Assent, and that there are thirteen other Bills which, as they have passed both Houses, and only await the Royal Assent, may be supposed to be already added to the legislation of the Session. On examination, however, the great proportion of these Bills prove to be measures of the most absolute and complete routine. There is hardly a single measure among them that can claim the dignity of being Legislative measures of even second-rate importance. This is not a circumstance which is new or peculiar to the present Session, for I find that during this Session nearly as many Bills will have been passed up to the expiration of July as in any of the last ten or twelve years. The number is somewhat smaller, but the difference is not material. What I wish to bring before your Lordships is that almost by the necessity of the case the same thing must be found in nearly every Session of Parliament. I wish to direct your attention to the manner in which Parliamentary business is conducted in the two Houses, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the mode of proceeding may not be altered so as to avoid the difficulty I have pointed out. I begin by acknowledging that the great proportion of Bills, 9 out of 10, or even 19 out of every 20, require to be originated in the other House of Parliament. This does not arise merely because there are a number of Bills which, owing to the privileges of the House of Commons, we are precluded from originating in this House. I will frankly confess that, as a general rule, the House of Commons is better adapted for originating and discussing measures of legislation in the first instance, and that your Lordships are better employed in revising and correcting the rough work, if I may say so, of the other House of Parliament. I do not mean to cast any discredit on your Lordships' House when I say that the proceedings here do not bear any comparison with those of the other House in regard to the minute examination of measures, especially if they are of any length. There is, comparatively speaking, so small a number of your Lordships who are disposed very carefully to consider the provisions of measures which may be introduced, or who are interested in calling attention to matters of detail, and there is so great a readiness to allow measures to be sent from this for consideration by the other House, that I suspect, unless a Bill happens to excite general attention, there is a risk of its being sent down without receiving that attention and consideration which would probably have been bestowed on it had it been sent up to your Lordships to be passed into a law. But assuming that in the great proportion of cases Bills should be introduced first in the other House of Parliament, we are led to consider what is the course of proceeding which is taken in regard to Bills in that House, and what is the prospect that those which originate there will come before your Lordships in a reasonable time in order to give you the opportunity of deliberately considering them. There is one point of difference between the proceedings of the House of Commons and those of your Lordships' House. I need not say that by the courtesy of this House any noble Lord has the privilege of placing a Bill on the table and obtaining for it a first reading, without the necessity of first obtaining consent to its introduction. In the House of Commons Members have no such power. It is necessary for them first to give notice on a preceding day that leave will be asked to introduce a Bill, and then upon that leave being asked considerable discussion may arise. Practically, therefore, Bills have one more stage to go through in the House of Commons than in your Lordships' House; and in cases where it is necessary to originate the Bill by the Resolution of a Committee of the Whole House there is added another stage, making two stages upon the introduction of certain measures more than are necessary in your Lordships' House. But, then, what are the facilities which the House of Commons affords, especially to the Government, for the introduction of Bills and the progress of public business? By the rules of the House of Commons two days are set apart for Motions by individual or independent Members of the House, and a third day, Wednesday, is set aside for the consideration of Bills without any preference in favour of Government measures over those of private Members, the Bills being taken in the order in which they stand on the notice paper. At the commencement of the Session the Government, by giving notice of all the measures they have prepared, and sometimes also, I fear, of measures that they have not prepared, during the recess, occupy the ground, and have an opportunity of introducing some Bills. But, except for the first week or fortnight of the Session, the Government have no precedence over private Members, and they are often placed in circumstances of great difficulty with regard even to the preliminary step of the introduction of their measures. When Bills are introduced the Government have nominally two days in the week for their consideration. We should, however, recollect the position in which the Government stand at the beginning of each Session with regard to the two days in the week allotted to them. It is necessary, in consequence of the expiration of the Mutiny Act, that a very early opportunity should be taken of laying before Parliament the number of men and the amount proposed to be demanded for the military and naval service of the country. The first object, therefore, is to go into Committee of Supply. The Mutiny Act cannot be passed before the Votes for men and money have been taken, and it is therefore necessary before Easter that these Votes should be considered in Supply. But, although the Government are nominally in possession of two days out of five for the transaction of Government business in the House of Commons, that statement, without further explanation, would lead to an erroneous idea in regard to the time actually at their disposal; because on every occasion of going into Committee of Supply it is open to any hon. Member to move any Amendment, and a discussion may be taken upon any subject whatever, on the ground that the consideration of grievances ought to precede the granting of Supply. It therefore often happens that a whole evening, and sometimes more than a whole evening, is occupied by discussing some question that has nothing to do with Committee of Supply. With regard to other Bills, a satisfactory rule has recently been made, that when the House has once gone into Committee on a Bill, and the Committee has reported progress, it is not competent for any hon. Member, when the Bill again comes before the House, to move an Amendment to the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair. But formerly that was not the case, and this was one of the modes that has been adopted by the House of Commons for the purpose of curtailing the forms of the House and saving time. I believe that this alteration was made under the presidency of my noble Friend (Viscount Eversley), whom I do not now see in his place, who presided with so much dignity and public utility over the deliberations of that House, and that was one of the many valuable improvements he introduced into the Parliamentary practice of the House of Commons. It has been found necessary of late years, indeed, to carry these restrictions to an extent that can hardly be justified. Your Lordships all know that on the presentation of petitions in this House the whole subject of those petitions may be entered upon and discussed; but it has been found necessary to put so absolute a restriction upon this right in the House of Commons that Members are not allowed to state anything except the substance of the petition, the parties from whom it proceeds, and their prayer. With regard to Committee of Supply, it is not only necessary that a Motion should be made whenever the Speaker leaves the chair; but upon every occasion when the House goes into Committee, afterwards, although no vote may have been taken on the previous occasion, a new Motion must be made and a new Amendment may be moved. And that may take place on every occasion when the Government seek to go into Committee of Supply. During these two days in the week, when devoted to the business of Supply, the Government may thus be indefinitely embarrassed and the public business indefinitely postponed by Amendment after Amendment. But, as I have said, it is necessary that a portion of Supply should be taken, otherwise it is impossible to pass the Mutiny Act. But that is not all; for every Friday, which is one of the two days at the disposal of the Government, a Motion is made "that this House at its rising adjourn to Monday." That Motion affords weekly an opportunity not indeed of moving a specific Amendment, but of discussing every description of subject, introduced without the slightest order or regularity, or without the possibility of any Minister speaking more than once in answer to numerous interpellations which may be addressed to each of them. Recently Thursday has been taken as a Government day instead of Friday, and the discussions upon the Motion for adjournment on Friday are not now taken out of the time allotted to Government business. So far as the promotion of public business is concerned, that is a very considerable improvement. But in the early part of the Session the Government are limited to two days in the week, and for public business of the character of legislation there is little or no time before Easter, from the necessity of obtaining Supply, and the difficulty of entering upon the consideration of Supply. I hope it will not be supposed that in alluding to the practice of the House of Commons I conceive myself entitled, or that your Lordships are entitled, to pass an opinion upon the mode in which the House of Commons transact their own business, or that such an opinion would carry any weight with it. Undoubtedly it is the function of the House of Commons to carry on their own business in their own way. What I want to show is that this is a state of things which the House of Commons have made many attempts to amend. It is to be regarded not as an exceptional state of things, but as one that does and may affect every Session of Parliament. I do not mean to say that there may not have been some additional delay in the present Session, owing to the introduction, at an unusually early period, of a Budget of an ambitious and complicated character, simultaneously with the introduction of a Commercial Treaty which led to much discussion and difference of opinion, and simultaneously also with the introduction of a Reform Bill, which occupied a great deal of the time of the House—upon which, however, I am not going to say a single word. The House of Commons, then, having one stage more for every Bill than your Lordships, and originating a greater number of Bills, the Government having only two days for the conduct of the Government business, those two days being greatly occupied by Motions in Supply, and those Motions being liable to interruption and great delay from the introduction of other subjects, the time for legislation at their disposal may be regarded as almost nil, and the result is that the number of Bills which received the Royal Assent before the end of July is comparatively small. From the year 1848 to 1860, but not including this year, the average number of Bills that received the Royal Assent up to the end of July for each year was 61, while the average number that received the Royal Assent from the end of July up to the end of August was also 61. That is to say, the number of Bills passed in a month when there is a very small number of Members of either House in attendance is equal on an average of years to the number that received the Royal Assent in all the five preceding months of the Session. My Lords, I have before me a precise state of the business of the House as it was this morning. Your Lordships have gone through some measures this evening, and so far it will not be correct at the present moment; but this morning there were 5 Bills standing for a third reading, 8 for Committee, (2 of which are referred to a Select Committee), 9 for a second reading the day for which is fixed, and 16 are waiting for a second reading for which no day is fixed—including 3 Bills which originated here, and appear likely also to terminate their existence in this House. The total number of Bills now on the table of your Lordships' House is 43; but even with regard to these 43 Bills, 15 or 16 of which came up on Monday, and 5 or 6 to-day, there are comparatively few which are of great importance. Now, there is, as I said before, a large number of Bills which your Lordships have not the power of originating. So far, however, as your power in that respect extends, you have not neglected the public business in the course of the present Session; for I find that you have sent down to the House of Commons 22 or 23 Bills, many of which are very important, including 7 relating to the Consolidation of the Criminal Law, which received your assent at an early period of the Session, and to whose consideration much industry and professional knowledge was applied. In addition to these, you passed a Bill for the regulation of the Divorce Court, the Indictable Offences Bill, the Companies Bill, a Bill for the Union of Benefices, another on the subject of Church Temporalities, the Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries Bill, the Bill relating to Endowed Charities, and a great number of other important measures. It must, however, be admitted, when we come to take notice of the progress which these measures have made in the House of Commons, that the position which they occupy on its Votes is not such as to encourage us to originate Bills in this House; for having examined the Votes of the House of Commons, I find that not one of the Bills which you have sent thither—the course of three of them, I may observe, I have been unable to trace—has yet passed through Committee. Ten of them are awaiting that stage, having passed a second reading, while there are nine which have not been successful in making even so rapid a progress, and have not passed the preliminary stage of the second reading. Consequently, under these circumstances, I am very much afraid that the time which your Lordships have given to the consideration of these Bills will have been, so far as the present Session is concerned, absolutely thrown away. I now come to deal with the state of business generally as it stands in the House of Commons, and that, I find, presents by no means a satisfactory aspect. There were in that House this morning only three Bills awaiting a third reading; eight awaited consideration, having been amended in Committee; while there were no less than 41 set down for Committee, including 10 which were sent down from this House; 25, including nine others sent down by your Lordships, stand for second reading; and, over and above this mass of business, there are, on the Votes of the other House, no less than six notices of Motion for leave to bring in Bills, which have yet to go through all their stages. Among these are the Militia Ballot Expenses Bill, the Medical Relief Bill, the Volunteers (Ireland) Bill, the India Civil Service Appointments Bill, and the East India Judicature Bill, some of which are Government measures. But more than this, there are financial proposals, in respect of which it will be necessary that the House of Commons should go into Committee and pass Resolutions to form the groundwork of Bills, which Bills will then have to pass through their several stages in the House of Commons, and go through your Lordships' House, before the Appropriation Bill can be introduced. This, I think you will agree with me, is no small amount of work to have to accomplish; especially when I tell you that this morning that huge impediment, the Bankruptcy Bill, consisting of 500 and odd clauses, stood at the head of the List—a Bill which the Attorney General, like another Sisyphus, is endeavouring to roll up the Parliamentary hill, but which no sooner reaches the top than it comes down again with far greater rapidity than it ascended. I said this Bill stood at the head of the list in the House of Commons this morning; but I believe it does so no more, for, if I am not misinformed, among the other painful sacrifices which Her Majesty's Ministers have been obliged to make, is the abandonment of the Bankruptcy Bill, with its 500 and odd clauses. It remains for the unfortunate Sisyphus to recommence rolling the Bill up-hill next Session. But there yet remain the Highways Bill, the Ecclesiastical Commission Bill, which is an important measure and must receive considerable discussion, and the European Forces in India Bill—one of the most important and difficult measures with which the Government is called upon to deal—besides the Poor-Law Board Continuance Bill, the Bills relating to the tenure of land in Ireland, the London Corporation Bill—which, to my certain knowledge, has been for some years on the Votes of the House of Commons—the Roman Catholic Charities Bill, another very important Bill which Parliament is all but pledged to pass this year—making, together with several other measures which I need not more particularly mention, but many of which are of considerable importance, 77 Bills in the other House of Parliament, in various stages, from which if I deduct the 19 Bills to which I have already alluded as having passed your Lordships' House, there will be left 58, none of which, or very few of which have yet gone through Committee—and all are awaiting the remaining stages in the House of Commons previous to coming up to your Lordships' House—and this at the end of the month of July! I have, however, in the observations which I have made given your Lordships but a very feeble picture of the embarrassment of the Government in regard to the business of the country. I say this, because I have been informed by a right hon. Gentleman who is likely to know, that according to the best calculation that can be made eight or nine nights more will be required to get through the Votes in Supply which still remain to be passed. Now, when you take into account the fact that the Government have only two, or at the utmost, three nights in each week at their disposal, I ask you what prospect there is at this period of the Session that the 58 Bills which I have mentioned will receive that consideration to which they are entitled, and without receiving which it would reflect no credit on Parliament that they should be allowed to pass into a law. And what, let me ask, is likely to be the result of this state of things? Why that, with perhaps a few insignificant exceptions, measures on the expediency of which the opinion of the country has been clearly pronounced, the main principles of which met with almost universal approval, and which it is most important should be settled, will fall to the ground, a sacrifice to that general massacre which usually takes place about this time of the year, and which this year will, I have no doubt, be as extensive as any former anniversary. So that legislation will have been absolutely brought to a standstill, and but little or nothing will have been accomplished in that direction during a Session which has already lasted six months, and which will not, in all probability, terminate for a month or six weeks to come. Now this, my Lords, is a subject which, in my opinion, will press itself upon your attention more and more, year after year, and if for the evils which it involves no remedy can be provided, the result must be that Parliament will be placed in a position neither creditable to itself nor useful to the nation. Surrounding circumstances have in the present Session been favourable to legislation. The Thames has this summer been more inoffensive than has of late been its wont. The temperature has been such as to enable the Members of the House of Commons to go through their senatorial labours without the feeling of absolute exhaustion. But, with all these incentives to work, it is too much to suppose that a large number of the independent Members of that House could go through six additional weeks of slavery, sitting from ten to fourteen hours a-day. And, if men could be found to accomplish so great a task, I feel certain that the physical prostration consequent on the exertion is not the means by which they would be best fitted to give due consideration to details of the measures brought under their notice; which, under such circumstances, there would be a tendency to slur over, so as to get rid of measures themselves, with the view of sending them up as speedily as possible to your Lordships' House. Such, my Lords, being the evils with which we have to contend, where are we to find for them a palliation or a remedy? Great benefit, it must be admitted, has been conferred by the operation of the Resolution of my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees, in accordance with which your Lordships will not, after a certain day, undertake the responsibility of dealing with a measure which it is impossible for you—owing to the time at which it is laid before you—to consider satisfactorily. In former years, Bills which were postponed until a late period of the Session were frequently passed with extravagant haste, and without the least consideration. I find that in one year—Parliament having been prorogued on the 5th of September—37 Bills received the Royal Assent in that month, and 61 in the August immediately preceding, while only 27 received the Royal Assent before the end of July of the same year. That perhaps was an extreme case. I also find that in 1853 only 40 Bills received the Royal Assent before the end of July, while in the following August 97 were added to the legislation of the country. It is impossible that these measures could have received ment had abated in consequence of a

The Earl of Derby

The Earl of Derby

I do not know that they were were laughed out of it

"though they understand the ges-
e not competent of an elephant."

at a constitutional
ed. At the same

t that any general
le of our legislation
the greatest possible arl said, he hoped he vague but a clear and

Well, I am ready to in-have communicated with the other House several subject, but in the present business the Government have possible to bestow that atten-subject which it is necessary to committing themselves to any

n. During the recess the sub-receive full consideration, and if likely that any satisfactory result obtained I think it would be most that some inquiry should be insti-n order to arrive unanimously, if re, at some plan which would be of advance to the progress of legislation.

regard to the mode of doing it, the

the Earl has suggested a Joint Com-tee. I believe there has not been a Joint Committee of both Houses for 200 years, but it is quite competent to both Houses to appoint a Joint Committee. I believe the objection which led to their ceasing came from your Lordships. You objected that the House of Commons would not take off their hats, as at a conference, and you also objected to their claim to have a double number of Members. If a Joint Committee were not appointed, the other plan of the noble Earl might be adopted—two separate Committees to consider the question, authorized to communicate with each other. These, however, are matters of detail, which may be considered during the recess. I do not propose to take any action this year. Among other reasons, besides the lateness of the Session,

it is quite clear that it is not the best moment to choose to propose a joint action on any subject of this kind, when questions have arisen between the two Houses with regard to which a certain number of Members of the other House feel a soreness at an unusual proceeding of your Lordships. It is obvious that, whatever measure is adopted, it should be as nearly was not thought expedient, however, in the House of Commons, to press the consideration of that Act, which accordingly fell to the ground, and the question has not since been renewed. Another mode has been suggested by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack—namely, that the two Houses should simultaneously appoint Committees which might be placed in communication with each other, and on their separate Reports, corresponding with each other, Resolutions might be founded which would accomplish the desired object. I do not know whether any advantage would be derived in this case from a conference between the two Houses; the instances, at all events, are very rare in which a question has been referred to a joint Committee; but in some one of these modes I do think it most important that the opinion of both Houses should be taken, and that means should be discovered of remedying what everybody admits to be a great grievance and a great inconvenience. I do not undertake to suggest to your Lordships which of these modes would be the preferable course. On the contrary, I think it is a matter which had much better be left to the Government; and on consultation with their colleagues in the other House, they will propose such a measure as they on their responsibility shall think fit. I do not therefore intend to trespass further on your Lordships' indulgence than to lay before you the statement which I have made as to the state of public business, and the nature of the only remedy which I believe can be successful. If it be convenient to the House, for the sake of regularity, I shall move that a Committee be appointed to consider this question, of course without the slightest intention of pressing that Motion. I hope my noble Friend the President of the Council, who I presume will follow me, will not satisfy himself with saying in his usual courteous manner, that he is sure the House and the Government are much indebted to the noble Earl opposite for the pains which he has taken in making himself master of this subject, and for the very clear exposition which he has given of the difficulties of the case; and that he could assure the noble Earl that he concurs with him in thinking the subject one of very deep importance, and that it shall receive the very best consideration of the Government. Of course, I do not expect any specific plan from my noble Friend to-night, but I hope to obtain from him something more definite than the courteous answer which I have heard from him on more than one occasion. I hope he will give us some intimation of the view which the Government take of this question, and that he will be able to say whether or not his colleagues are of opinion that any legislation or any Resolution, or any other course by which an agreement might be come to by both Houses, is likely to meet with acceptance, or would in their opinion be a mode of diminishing if not altogether doing away with the inconvenience which both Houses, and your Lordships' House in particular, must feel in being called on either to reject Bills passed by the other House and thus to render it necessary to begin again with them next Session de novo, with probably as little chance of success, or else to pass them without giving them that consideration which it is due to your character and the interest of the country you should give before affixing your sanction to any legislative measure. The noble Earl then concluded with his Motion.

The Earl of Derby

Moved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and consider the best mode of carrying on the Parliamentary Business.

EARL GRANVILLE: Notwithstanding the pleasant sally of the noble Earl, I must say that I think your Lordships, and indeed, both Houses of Parliament, are much indebted to him for having brought the subject under our notice, and further, notwithstanding his protest, that I think he has made a most clear statement of the evils which exist. The House will agree with me, too, that the noble Earl has amply redeemed the pledge which he gave the other night that he intended to treat the question entirely as one of public importance and divested of any party spirit. I am free to admit that there are circumstances this year, though as far as the Government is concerned a satisfactory explanation of them might be given, which a leader of the Opposition might be tempted to make use of in a party spirit. There is no doubt as to the existence of the evil, though I think there is something to be said on the other side. The noble Earl has said that somewhere about 150 Bills had been, or would be, brought under the consideration of Parliament this Session. I am not altogether clear whether it is desirable that that number of Bills should be passed every Session; but, on the other hand, there is no doubt that the present difficulties of legislation do prevent useful measures being passed, for no other reason but the accumulation of business in the other House of Parliament. This is not a new evil. The noble Earl himself says he called attention to it twelve years ago for the purpose of remedying it; and I remember hearing both Lord Aberdeen and Lord Lansdowne say that they had heard similar complaints, more or less loud, during the whole of their official existence of nearly fifty years. At the same time it must be admitted that the evil is rather on the increase than the decrease, and this year it has been so great as to be a hindrance to the passing of useful and necessary measures through the other House. But when after considering the evil they came to consider the remedy, the matter became more difficult. The noble Earl has alluded to one remedy which we have attempted to apply as one means of mitigating the evil—namely the Resolution which we pass annually, fixing a certain day after which we will not read a Bill a second time. I may remark that that Resolution has been pointed to elsewhere as a hindrance to legislation, and I have often thought that it was a Resolution which might fairly be questioned. It was agreed to by your Lordships, however, for your own defence, and as far as I can form an opinion, if acted upon with a certain elasticity, it works usefully, and has not a disadvantageous effect on the legislation of the other House. With regard to the other remedy proposed by the noble Earl—the suspending of Bills at a certain stage, so as to make it possible to take them up in another Session—it is a most important question, and one to which, so far as your Lordships are concerned, you have given your assent by passing the Bill of the noble Earl some years ago. Constitutional objections may be urged to it, I believe; but, not having perhaps thoroughly considered the subject, I cannot see the force of them. With regard to private Bills, where both Houses act more as courts of justice than legislative bodies, it is an immense hardship on parties, when they have gone to a considerable expense in promoting a Bill, and have got to a certain stage, their further progress is stopped, by some public object, all the money they have spent is sacrificed, and they are obliged to commence again in another Session. A question was raised as to the principle here involved in the case of the impeachment of Warren Hastings. If I remember rightly the lawyers raised an objection that the impeachment had abated in consequence of a dissolution. I do not know that they were not right, but they were laughed out of it by Burke, who said that “though they might be competent to understand the gestation of a mouse they were not competent to understand the gestation of an elephant.” This shows, however, that a constitutional objection might be raised. At the same time, there is no doubt that any general change in the principle of our legislation is one which requires the greatest possible care. The noble Earl said, he hoped he should receive not a vague but a clear and definite answer. Well, I am ready to inform him that I have communicated with my Colleagues in the other House several times on the subject, but in the present pressure of business the Government have not found it possible to bestow that attention to the subject which it is necessary to give before committing themselves to any definite plan. During the recess the subject shall receive full consideration, and if it appears likely that any satisfactory result would be obtained I think it would be most desirable that some inquiry should be instituted in order to arrive unanimously, if possible, at some plan which would be of assistance to the progress of legislation. With regard to the mode of doing it, the noble Earl has suggested a Joint Committee. I believe there has not been a Joint Committee of both Houses for 200 years, but it is quite competent to both Houses to appoint a Joint Committee. I believe the objection which led to their ceasing came from your Lordships. You objected that the House of Commons would not take off their hats, as at a conference, and you also objected to their claim to have a double number of Members. If a Joint Committee were not appointed, the other plan of the noble Earl might be adopted—two separate Committees to consider the question, authorized to communicate with each other. These, however, are matters of detail, which may be considered during the recess. I do not propose to take any action this year. Among other reasons, besides the lateness of the Session, it is quite clear that it is not the best moment to choose to propose a joint action on any subject of this kind, when questions have arisen between the two Houses with regard to which a certain number of Members of the other House feel a soreness at an unusual proceeding of your Lordships. It is obvious that, whatever measure is adopted, it should be as nearly as possible unanimously adopted by both Houses.

LORD BROUGHAM concurred with the Lord President in thanking the noble Earl for the clear, useful, and (to coin a new word to describe a novelty) "unparty" statement which he had made on this subject. It was the duty of Parliament, without more delay than was absolutely necessary, to endeavour to apply a remedy to this evil; but circumstances had recently occurred which rendered it expedient that immediate action should not be taken. The course which he would recommend would be a Joint Committee, and in whatever way that Committee was composed—whether or not the Commons had an equal number—he trusted that they would act in the impartial spirit of jurymen, and that they would not be found to give their votes in two divisions, one of the Lords and the other of the Commons, so as to bring matters to a standstill, but that the important subject committed to them should be fairly and calmly discussed, with a view of arriving at some practical and useful result, as their Lordships were aware it had been proclaimed that Parliamentary Government was on its trial, and never, till the present Session, in the opinion of foreign countries, had it shown itself so incompetent for the discharge of its functions. People elsewhere thought that only one mode of free Government was tolerable, and it was one which we deemed intolerable—namely, universal suffrage. Universal suffrage meant Government by the mob, armed and unarmed, and a dictator presiding over that multitude. That was the form which was supposed elsewhere to be the perfection of free Government, and which was set up in contrast to Parliamentary Government. His belief was that our Parliamentary Government, with all its faults, was infinitely preferable to anything of that description. Universal suffrage was unlimited despotism—Parliamentary Government was free and inferred the capacity of improvement. He believed that either by Standing Orders of both Houses, or by Act of Parliament, or by some other measure resulting from the action of a Joint Committee, the greater part of the mischief could be greatly mitigated, if not wholly remedied. The Motion on Fridays in the other House, that upon its rising it adjourn to Monday, gave rise to endless debates, to the exclusion of every other subject, and to the postponement and defeat of most important measures. It was a most mischievous practice, which had been introduced only in recent times, and could be remedied at once by a Standing Order. He would not enter further into the proceedings of the other House, for which he entertained the greatest possible respect, and for that particular proceeding he entertained all the respect which was possible. He believed that much might be done without any Act of Parliament, by Orders and Resolutions of the two Houses, backed by that without which all Orders and Resolutions would prove of no avail—namely, a firm determination on the part of the leaders in Parliament to carry the Resolutions which had been framed into effect.

Earl Granville

LORD REDESDALE agreed with the noble Earl, the President of the Council, that they should be very cautious in altering their proceedings, as they had been found, upon the whole, to work well; and they were not sure they could make them work better. The question could not be fairly judged by particular cases. The noble Earl had instanced that of the Bankruptcy Bill, which was of enormous length, and was entirely unconnected with party, as affording a strong support to his argument. But let them take, on the other hand, the Reform Bill. It was necessary for the promoters of it to persevere to a certain degree, on account of its importance, although it did not meet with general approbation; and the conviction that it could not get through both Houses in the Session, afforded a just and useful excuse for its withdrawal. But if the Government could have carried it through the House of Commons, and then passed it up to this House for discussion in the ensuing Session, would not a great deal more pressure have been put upon the Government not to drop it; and would that not have led to a greater consumption of time than had already taken place upon it, to the exclusion of other business? And, he would ask, could anything be more mischievous than to hang up a Bill of that character during the recess, or could a stronger proof be afforded that such a practice would lead to the ultimate adoption of bad measures, and especially on matters of the greatest importance on which there was much difference of opinion? He was not one who thought that they legislated too little. He thought that, upon the whole, there was as much legislation as was desirable for the country, and in some years a great deal too much. He thought it an advantage that this Bankruptcy Bill of 500 clauses should stand over for another year, and be considered in the interval in all its bearings, and divided into two Bills. In some Sessions a great deal of business was done, because the measures had been previously considered. That was the case in 1845. Perhaps no public measure caused much greater excitement than the Maynooth Act. It was introduced early, and occupied a great deal of time; but while it was under discussion both Houses passed the Companies Clauses Act, of 165 clauses, and a Scotch Act equally as long; the Lands Clauses Act, of 163 clauses, and a Scotch Act of about as many; and the Railway Clauses Act, of 165 clauses, at an early period of the Session. Most of these measures were the result of previous experience; and on account of that experience, and the conviction that some general legislation was desirable, they were passed with due attention and great expedition, notwithstanding their minuteness of detail, their extreme length, and the manner in which they affected the interests of private individuals. In the same Session they passed the Poor Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill, with 92 clauses, a new system of Customs regulations, embodied in a Bill of 163 clauses, a Bill for the registration of British vessels, and other measures; and in the same Session the Enclosure Commission Bill was introduced, which contained 169 clauses. It showed that there was great power of legislation in Parliament, if there was a disposition to use it; and he believed the failure of Bills was, in a great degree, owing to doubts arising as to their soundness, and to the unwillingness, therefore, of Parliament to entertain them. But, supposing any remedy were desirable, this was not the House in which a change was necessary. With regard to any amount of business which they were called upon to do, they were always ready to do it; and, if the other House were to adopt a little more the practice of this House in the manner of conducting its proceedings, he believed that the business would be carried on in a much more rapid and satisfactory manner. He did not say that he wished the other House should in the present Session enter upon a discussion of the subject, because it would only occupy one or more of those nights, which were already too few for the measures which must pass. If what had been proposed by the noble Earl was the proper remedy, it could be effected in the other House by an Order. For example, supposing the Bankruptcy Bill had passed the House of Commons, they could, if they chose, send it up to this House next Session, without commencing de novo. It was not for their Lordships to inquire whether it had been read a first, second, or third time; or whether two or more of these stages had been omitted, or even if, after a single debate, it had been sent up in the same shape in which it passed in the Session preceding. Such a mode of treating measures was not necessary in their Lordships' House, because they could find enough time to consider every measure; but if such a remedy in the other House were necessary, that course might be adopted, and perhaps limited to Bills of great length, and of a particular character. With regard to legislation generally, he was of opinion that there was often an advantage in a Bill being lost for want of time, and that the proper control of Parliament would be perilled, if the Government had the power to suspend Bills, and take them up again in the next Session. He trusted that great reluctance would be shown to depart from that principle upon which the legislation of the country had been so long and satisfactorily conducted by both Houses of Parliament.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said that, although he took a great interest in this subject, and had devoted a considerable degree of attention to it, he would content himself with thanking the noble Earl for calling attention to the subject and for the manner in which he had brought it under the notice of their Lordships. He did not agree with his noble Friend who had just spoken in thinking that no improvement could be effected in the present mode of transacting the business of Parliament. He believed that their mode of legislation was capable of amendment; but he refrained from going into any details at that moment. He would be happy to use his best exertions to bring forward a measure on the subject, with the assistance of his colleagues, and he hoped with the support of the noble Earl, than whom no one was more capable of giving advice on the subject.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

House adjourned at Half past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, Half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, July 19, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^d Militia Ballot; Gunpowder, &c.; Volunteer Rifle Corps.
3^d Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland).

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)
BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Glossary).

MR. M'MAHON said, he rose to move that the Chairman do now leave the chair. He did so because the Bill was one entirely for the landlords of Ireland, and not for the advantage of the tenants. They were asked to go into Committee upon the Bill, without receiving any explanation of its provisions. There were a great many statutes on the subject, and it was proposed to consolidate and amend them; but they were not told how much was new, how much was old, how much was consolidation, and how much improvement; but the Bill was simply thrown upon the table, it being left to hon. Gentlemen to make out its provisions for themselves by a laboured study of its contents. The Bill contained 106 sections, and repealed 57 Acts of Parliament. Every section of the Bill was favourable to the landlord and against the tenant—in short, they were a simple confirmation of the Acts passed by landlords in their own favour for the last 400 years—from the reign of Edward IV. The Bill would have the further effect of making the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland essentially different from what it was in England, though they all professed to be in favour of making the law similar in both countries. It also abolished the power of landlord and tenant to make verbal contracts for three years. There was no part of the Empire in which it was so desirable to encourage the farmer to plant trees, and labour to preserve them, as in Ireland; but, by the 31st section, a farmer was liable to a penalty of £5 for each tree or shrub cut down, topped, lopped, or grubbed, without the landlord's consent, even though it might be necessary to do so for the preservation of the tree or the improvement of the farm. Thus he could not lop off a withered branch, crop a hedge, cut a gooseberry bush, or grub up underwood, without asking leave of the landlord. Another objectionable clause was that by which, wherever in existing leases the mines had been reserved, the landlord might go in and work them in any way he chose. Clause 35, relative to waste, was even more intolerable. By that clause, if the landlord went before a magistrate, and showed that he had reason to believe the tenant was intending to commit any unlawful waste, injury, or destruction, the magistrate might issue his warrant forbidding such act, and if that were not attended to, commit the tenant, his aiders and abettors, to prison for three months. Surely such an arbitrary power was not the law of England, or of Scotland, or of any other country. In fact a tenant might by this clause be sent to gaol for three months for carrying out what he believed to be his right according to the terms of his contract. Again, the power of ejectment by the Quarter Sessions for non-payment of rent was extended by this Bill. As it now stood, where a year's rent was due and the rent was not more than £50, such a proceeding might be adopted, but it would now be extended to cases where the rent was £100; and, moreover, it was now to be provided that such eviction might take place "even before the expiration of the time, if any, limited for the entry of the landlord in any lease or agreement." The provisions as to ejectment for overholding or for desertion of the premises, were equally unjust to the tenant. These were but a few of the grievances created by this Bill, which was called a Consolidation Bill. He thought the other Landlord and Tenant Bill, proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) was, upon the whole, a much better one. He asked the House to pause ere they passed such a Bill. It was the same Bill as the Bill of 1853, which was sent up to the House of Lords, together with the Tenant's Compensation Bill, it being looked upon as a counterpoise to the latter Bill, and being consented to on that ground; but when the tenant's Compensation Bill was rejected by the House of Lords while this Bill was passed, the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) said that it was not his intention to persevere with it. For these reasons he should move that the Chairman do now leave the chair.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he should support the Motion. The Bill was founded on a measure which he had himself introduced in the year 1853; but he had since thought proper to amend that measure, and his amended Bill, which contained sixty-seven additional clauses, stood on the notice paper of the House for committal that day. It was not his intention to go on with that Bill, and when they came to it he would move that the order for the Committee should be discharged, because he felt persuaded that it would be idle to attempt to proceed with it during the present Session. He thought it rather hard that the Government should be pressing forward his defective Bill of 1853, instead of aiding him to carry his improved Bill. Besides, he thought that what was new in the measure should have been pointed out. He believed that portion of the Bill which related to the law of distress was very imperfect. In his own Bill he wished to extend to the other parts of Ireland the practice which prevailed in Ulster, where the in-coming tenant settled with the outgoing tenant for the value of improvements which he might have made on the farm. There was no pressing necessity for the measure; and he would recommend his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland to consider the whole question seriously during the recess—to take both Bills together, and select what portions of both he thought best, and, perhaps, in another Session they might be able to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland.

MR. DEASY maintained that the Bill had been thoroughly considered on the second reading, and complained of a discussion on the principle of the Bill being now raised in Committee. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. M'Mahon) had criticised the Bill, he did not say unfairly, but he had not done so at the right time. He invited him to repeat his criticisms on the clauses as they came before them in Committee, and he would be ready to adopt such Amendments as were fair and reasonable. If it could be shown that any of the clauses were unjust to the tenant, he would at once consent to expunge them. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) complained that his new provisions had not been introduced into the present Bill; but his reply was, that he had never seen the new provisions of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill till they were printed by order of the House, and, therefore, he could not have availed himself of them. He must say, however, that he could not adopt the provisions of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill with regard to the law of distress, or of fixtures, and that he preferred the clauses of the present Bill. He did not say that the measure was a perfect one, but it would be a material improvement on the existing law, and would be highly beneficial to the tenantry of Ireland. Its object was to make the law more clear and simple, so that both landlord and tenant might be perfectly apprised of their relative rights and liabilities. The law ought not to be left in such a state as to afford the tenant a continual temptation, instead of paying his rent, to spend his money in litigation with his landlord, and to waste among the attorneys those funds which might be better employed in stocking a new farm. With this view, to render the law more plain and the remedies for any infringement of it efficacious and inexpensive, the Bill had been very carefully prepared, and he trusted it would be allowed to go into Committee.

MR. LEFROY said, he thought it would be ungracious, after what the Attorney General for Ireland had said, to divide against going on with the Bill in Committee; but, at the same time, he put it to the Attorney General whether, after what had fallen from his right hon. Friend (Mr. Whiteside) and the hon. and learned Member for Wexford, it would be expedient to proceed with a Bill of such importance at this period of the Session.

MR. CARDWELL said, he must appeal to those hon. Gentlemen who were anxious for a real settlement of the tenant law of Ireland, not to prolong this preliminary discussion, but proceed to look into the clauses of this Bill, and those of the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside), in Committee. The Government were quite ready, in the most candid spirit, to compare the merits of the two Bills; and they had no desire to stand upon any particular feature of their own Bill, but would adopt such provisions as might seem to the House to be best. After the great pains which had been taken, by two successive Governments of late years, to prepare a measure upon the subject, he hoped it would be allowed to proceed. At any rate, he would not be responsible for the delay.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 8; Noes 88: Majority 80.

Clauses 1 to 34 agreed to.

Clause 35 (Prevention of Waste and Law of Repairs).

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART moved

the omission of the clause. Under the present law the landlord who had reason to apprehend a waste of the property should apply to the Court of Chancery for its prohibition; and that power could not be transferred to a magistrate without disadvantage to the tenant.

MR. DEASY explained that the object of the clause was to facilitate the prevention of waste, and so to save expense, both to the landlord and the tenant. The tenant could appeal to the Quarter Sessions against the decision of the magistrate, and the only restraint that would be put upon him was that he could not in the meantime injure the property.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 89; Noes 21: Majority 68.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 36 (Punishment of Disobedience of Precept).

MR. BUTT moved the omission of the clause. It would introduce the action of the police for the purpose of enforcing regulations between landlords and tenants; and he thought that the police ought not to be allowed to interfere in those cases of private rights.

MR. DEASY said, he admitted that there was considerable force in the objection which had been made to the clause, and he would not therefore press it. But he wished to give notice that on the bringing up of the Report he would introduce some other provision for the purpose of securing a compliance with the injunction against waste. He did not mean to give the constabulary any power which they did not now possess.

LORD NAAS said, he objected to the question being postponed. It would be better to settle the point in Committee.

MR. HENNESSY moved that the Chairman report progress.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

PEACE PRESERVATION ACT (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM VERNER said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will introduce into the Peace Preservation Act Clauses to prevent the exhibition of Flags upon Places of Worship and Public Buildings in Ireland, and to restrain, under certain circumstances, the beating of drums or playing upon musical instruments on the high roads or places of public resort in that country.

Mr. Pollard Urquhart

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, it is the opinion of the Government that the law prohibiting the exhibition of these devices, which unfortunately have given occasion to some of those outrages in Ireland which are so much to be regretted, requires amendment, and it is proposed to amend it with the view stated by the hon. Baronet.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

MR. DEASY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: The Committee will recollect the question before us when this Bill was last under discussion was one of the very greatest importance. It was the question whether any person, be he a trader or non-trader, shall be subject to the uniform system of administering the law of insolvency proposed to be established by this measure. Although this question may have never before been discussed in the House of Commons, it has been the subject of repeated consideration out of this House during a period, I may say, of thirty years, and whether in the Reports of Commissioners, in the discussions in the other House of Parliament, or in the speeches of the most learned Lords and jurists, there has been but one growing opinion, that it is incumbent on the Legislature, upon every consideration, both of justice and expediency, to do away with the distinction between the code of bankruptcy and the law relating to insolvent debtors, and to substitute for them one uniform system. I believe in this country alone there prevails this peculiarity, that the man who is not a trader has no opportunity, as a general rule, of surrendering his estate for the purposes of an equal distribution among his creditors until he has been first committed to prison. The anomaly and injustice of this rule are most apparent. For what object should you imprison the honest debtor who is desirous of making a cessio bonorum for the benefit of his creditors? To what end is it that so many thousand persons are in this country annually committed to prison, only to be discharged again a few weeks afterwards by the operation of the Insolvent Debtors' Act? Some efforts were made for the amelioration of this state of the law through the legislation introduced by Lord Lyndhurst, whose opinion is worthy of the highest respect; but, generally speaking, the rule I have described still obtains, and, accordingly, the debtor is compelled to submit to incarceration before he can do that which justice and expediency require that every man in a condition of insolvency should have every facility allowed to him for doing, namely, to surrender his property for distribution among his creditors. Now, with that view, I have proposed this enactment, which has been drawn up in very wide terms, because while it would, no doubt, have been necessary to surround the provision with proper safeguards, I have felt that it ought to be left open to the discretion of the House. If this discussion had proceeded, it was my intention to have recommended, in the first place, that the enactment should be entirely prospective—that is to say, that no existing debt (no debt contracted before the Bill came into operation) should avail to support an adjudication of bankruptcy against any person who is a non-trader. It was the object of the measure to lay down some simple and unquestionable tests of insolvency which all would admit might have been justly applied to the non-trader. By tests of insolvency I mean those acts which are commonly denominated acts of bankruptcy. The first test of insolvency proposed to be established by the Bill is absconding from the country and remaining abroad with intent to defeat or delay the remedies of the creditors. I think no hon. Gentleman in this House would for a moment contend that an individual guilty of such conduct should not be deprived of his property, and that that property should not be taken by process of law for distribution among his creditors. Another test of insolvency proposed by the Bill is the debtor's causing his property to be taken in execution, or suffering it to be so taken and disposed of, to the prejudice of the general body of his creditors. Now, no man who is possessed either of means or of credit would permit that to be done; and, therefore, I think such an act would be a very satisfactory criterion of his insolvency. Another mode of arriving at the same result is that if a judgment is obtained against a non-trader, and he is, after a certain period, summoned and examined as to his means of paying that judgment, provided he does not dispute its validity, and it is proved that he had not sufficient property to satisfy it, then he should be liable to have his estate taken from him and divided among those who had just claims upon him. There remains another test proposed by the Bill, which has not been generally understood by the House, and which, as it has been the subject of much misrepresentation, the Committee will perhaps permit me for a moment to explain. It is intended by the measure to apply to the case of the non-trader those clauses in the existing Bankruptcy Act which are commonly denominated the debtors' clauses—that is to say, clauses which enable the creditors to summon the debtor before the Court of Bankruptcy, and call upon him either to pay or satisfy the Court that he has the means of doing so. But I have not thought it fair to include them in this Bill in the naked shape in which they exist in the bankruptcy statutes; and accordingly the Committee will observe, if they will turn to the Bill, that no opportunity to make any demand of this kind against a debtor is given to any creditor who is not in a condition to prove to the Court that the debtor is in insolvent circumstances, and is seeking to evade his creditors. I should have had no difficulty, if the Bill proceeded, in confining this provision to the case of traders, and exempting non-traders from its operation. If this result had been attained the measure would have assumed this form, that no person who was not a trader would have been subject to its operation unless he were absconding or remaining away from this country, unless he was a judgment debtor without the means of paying his debts, or unless his property was actually being so disposed of as to defraud his creditors. I have no doubt, therefore, that if the discussion had gone on, the Committee would have been satisfied with the guards and precautions introduced, or proposed to be introduced, by this measure. But, Sir, reflecting on the anxiety manifested by the House, it appeared to be incumbent on me to consider whether, supposing I succeeded in satisfying the Committee, and in inducing it to extend the Bill to the case of the non-trader, still, if the subsequent provisions of the Bill required so much time to be expended in their discussion that I could not carry the measure up to the House of Lords probably until the beginning of August, it would be consistent with ordinary decency at that period of the year to send up a Bill containing such novel and important provisions to the other House, and expect that Assembly then to take them into its consideration. I, therefore, could not avoid arriving at the conclusion that the House of Lords ought not to be placed in that situation. On the other hand, if I were not fortunate enough to carry with me the opinion of the Committee, and these clauses were to be struck out, it would then be necessary to entirely recast the measure; because hon. Members will do me the favour to recollect that I have been encouraged to go on under the conviction that the House was favourable to this extension of the law. For, with the view of raising the question, the second section of the Bill proposed the abolition of the Insolvent Debtors' Court, and had the Committee been adverse to that proposition, it might naturally have been supposed that its feeling would have been expressed during the consideration of that clause. I was the more encouraged to hope that this alteration of the law would have met the approval of the House, because the same provision was contained in the Bill introduced by the Earl of Derby's Government, and therefore I expected that it would have been received with the more general concurrence. I cannot, however, complain that the House should have viewed this as a matter demanding the most careful deliberation, and we are therefore in this difficulty, that even if we succeeded with the Bill, we could not hope to finish it in time for it to undergo discussion in the other House. On the other hand, if we failed there would equally be insufficient time for bringing the measure forward in an amended shape. I have, therefore, with the approbation of the Government, come unwillingly to the conclusion that it is necessary to abandon the Bill. I hope, however, when this subject has again to be considered, it will be found that the time and attention already devoted to it has not been thrown away. I have gained considerable experience from our discussions; and I trust if I retain office—and if not, the task will be undertaken by more competent hands—I trust I shall be able in another Session to present this measure in less gigantic and formidable proportions, and embodying all its principles and objects in a more condensed form. I trust it will be introduced, whether by myself or by my successor, at an earlier period of the year, when it can receive the due consideration necessary to enable it to pass, for there is a growing and urgent demand for legislation upon this subject. I have only now to express my regret if, in my earnest anxiety to carry this Bill, I have ever seemed to evince any impatience towards the House. I had naturally hoped that during this Session it would have been possible to make some important advance in the improvement of this branch of our law. Circumstances have, however, prevented it; and I trust I can say that nobody will be able to reproach me with having lost any fair opportunity for bringing this great question to a successful termination. I move, Sir, that you do now leave the Chair with the view of proposing, when the House resumes, that the Order of the Day be discharged.

The Attorney General

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: Sir, I have so often ventured to express anxiety with regard to the progress of this Bill that I am sure the Committee will believe me to be sincere when I say, that I entirely concur in the regrets which have been expressed by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General at the necessity which, under existing circumstances, has arisen for its postponement till another Session. I do not mean to say one word by way of suggestion that the course which has been taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman is not a necessary course, is not the most advisable one which he could have adopted. I am sure that the Committee will respond entirely to the demand which the hon. and learned Attorney General has made upon us, and will join with me in expressing the gratitude which is due to him for the pains and labour which he has bestowed upon this measure. I certainly hope that those pains and that labour have not been thrown away, but that at some future time the Bill will be reintroduced and successfully carried through this House. If I may venture to make a suggestion to the hon. and learned Gentleman it is this, that, when the subject of the bankruptcy law comes again before the House, great advantage would be gained if the measure first presented was not a Bill for consolidating the entire law of bankruptcy, but was confined to the changes proposed to be made in that law. Such a measure would distinctly raise the question as to the effect and the extent of those changes, and after it had been passed the consolidation of the law would be a matter of very little difficulty. In place of having a Bill of 500 or 600 clauses brought before the House, we should in the first instance have one of some 50 or 100 clauses containing all the changes, and the larger measure would afterwards be treated more as a matter of routine than as one of discussion. As my hon. and learned Friend has referred to the Bill which was brought in by the late Government, I think I may add that that was the course which was taken by the late Government, and I still think, as I thought then, that great advantage would have resulted from its adoption. The course taken was to lay before and pass through the other House a Bill confined to the changes proposed to be made in the law, with the view and upon a statement that when that Bill had passed both Houses of Parliament it should be followed by a general measure repealing all previous statutes and consolidating the law. Of course, I do not now propose to advert to my hon. and learned Friend's proposal as to making non-traders liable to the bankrupt laws. I still think that, if accompanied by efficient safeguards, it may safely be done. What those safeguards are I will not now discuss. I must, before I sit down, say that it will be matter of great regret to every one that the Resolution at which my hon. and learned Friend has arrived has not been earlier communicated to the Members of this House. We are here this evening apparently expecting a discussion upon the Bankruptcy Bill, and I greatly fear that a number of hon. Members who are very much interested in the questions which are to come on upon going into Committee of Supply are not at all prepared for the change which has been made. I cannot help thinking that the resolution which has been come to must have been known to the Government for some time, and it would have been more convenient if it had been earlier announced what business was actually to be proceeded with to-night.

MR. MALINS said, he deeply regretted that circumstances had not enabled his hon. and learned Friend to go on with this very valuable measure. At the same time, he thought that his hon. and learned Friend had exercised a sound discretion in abandoning it for the present. He had stated more than once in the House, as he had communicated to the Attorney General privately, that he was afraid that the time had come when, if he attempted to press the measure through the House, it would be so mutilated, and would be deprived of so many of its most valuable provisions, that it would confer upon the public but little benefit, and upon its author very little lasting reputation—very little, indeed, of that reputation to which the days and nights of labour which he had bestowed upon it entitled him. By the course he had now taken, and by availing himself of the very valuable suggestions which had been thrown out in the course of the debate, the Attorney General would have an opportunity, if he introduced the measure early next Session, of passing it in such a form as would be advantageous to the public and most honourable to himself. The suggestion which had been thrown out by his hon. and learned Friend near him (Sir Hugh Cairns) as to the form in which the measure should be re-introduced was a most valuable one, and, in his opinion, the Attorney General would do well to adopt it. If he had the good fortune to be in the House next year, he should do his utmost, as he had done this year, to assist in passing a measure which should embody the great principles which had been enunciated by his hon. and learned Friend. He regretted that the House had not been earlier informed of the change in the business of the evening; but he was sure that if his hon. and learned Friend could have communicated the information earlier, he would have done so.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to thank the hon. and learned Attorney General for the labour he had bestowed upon the measure, and to express a hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman would not consent to make any further concessions when he again introduced his Bill into Parliament.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I should have been extremely sorry to be wanting in courtesy or attention to the House in this matter. The decision which I have announced was not arrived at until two o'clock to-day, and it was immediately intimated to the Gentleman who is the usual organ of communication with hon. Members opposite.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I do not, of course, object to the withdrawal of this Bill. On the contrary, I do not see how the hon. and learned Gentleman could have acted otherwise under the circumstances. I entirely concur in the great admiration expressed by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) for the ability and labour which the hon.

and learned Attorney General has bestowed on the subject, and in the feeling of regret that the extraordinary course of business in the present Session should have rendered necessary the abandonment of so valuable and important a measure. Nor can I help pointing out to the noble Lord at the head of the Government and to the House the extreme inconvenience which must arise from the withdrawal of a public Bill of this importance and magnitude in this sudden and unexpected manner, when the House has assembled with the intention of considering the measure in Committee for several hours. The result must inevitably be to defeat the object for which the order of our business is printed. I observe that the next order on the paper for this evening, is the consideration of the Navy Estimates in Committee of Supply. Upon the Motion for going into Committee, the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Southwark has given notice of his intention to call our attention to the subject of Greenwich Hospital; but my hon. and gallant Friend is not now in his place, and in all probability he has no idea of the sudden change which has taken place. I am bound to accept the statement which, in a tone of so much gravity, the Attorney General has made; but, on the other hand, I must remind him that it was matter of current rumour in this House on Monday and Tuesday that the Government had decided, or very nearly so, to withdraw the Bankruptcy Bill. Under these circumstances I would ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government—who I must say conducts the business of this House generally with great courtesy and fairness—whether it is not desirable that Her Majesty's Ministers should make up their minds upon matters of this importance a little sooner, so that the House should not be exposed to the serious inconvenience which must arise from sudden and unexpected changes in the course of business.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I very much regret the inconvenience, if any, to which the House may be put by the announcement which my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has made. At the same time, I think the House would have been put to still greater inconvenience if we had persisted in asking the House to go into Committee on the Bankruptcy Bill after we had resolved to withdraw it for the present Session. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: I did not ask you to do that.] I mean, if we had invited the House to give a decision upon a material point of the Bill while we were satisfied in our own minds that the measure could not be carried through. I think one statement which the right hon. Baronet has made in some degree diminishes the ground of his complaint, because he says that, as far back as Monday and Tuesday, it was generally believed in this House that the Bill was to be abandoned for the present Session. If that be so, the announcement which my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has made cannot have taken the right hon. Baronet, at least, wholly by surprise.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: But the Bankruptcy Bill is on the paper for this evening.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It is. But all I can say is, that we attached so much importance to this measure that we were exceedingly reluctant to give up the hope of being able to carry it through during the present Session. We clung to that hope, perhaps, longer than reason would have justified. There are cases in which hope is said to survive reason; but, be that as it may, we were unwilling to withdraw the Bill until the conviction forced itself upon our minds that there was no reasonable expectation of our being able to pass it in the present Session. We almost came to that opinion yesterday, but our decision was made to depend upon a communication which I was to have with my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General this morning. I had that communication; I found that he entirely concurred in the conviction to which we had come; and he has taken the earliest opportunity to state it to the House. Those hon. Members who are interested in the business of the House this evening will naturally have looked at the Orders. They will have seen that Committee of Supply was appointed to follow the Bankruptcy Bill. Suppose that the labours of the Attorney General elsewhere had rendered him unable to go on with the Bill to-day—not at all an unlikely thing to have happened—we should then have proceeded at once to the consideration of the Navy Estimates in Committee of Supply. Hon. Members ought to take such contingencies into account; at any rate, nobody can complain that we should now go on with the next Order of the Day.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he was sure that the withdrawal of the Bankruptcy Bill would be a matter of great regret, not only to the Members of that House, but to many persons out of doors. The hon. and learned Attorney General might console himself with the reflection that his failure was not owing to any want of diligence or zeal on his part. The truth was that the Bill had been smothered by the immense mass of other important business before the House. He certainly thought that it would have been wiser to have divided the scheme into two or three measures, and to have put the controverted matter into only one. He did not think, however, that the time of the House had been wasted in the discussions which had taken place. The Attorney General had seen some of the difficulties which he would have to contend with in another Session, especially in connection with his proposition to include non-traders in the same category as traders—a question for which, though it had been much discussed in professional circles, the country at large did not seem to be prepared. Great changes of that kind could not be made with a rush or a leap; they must be discussed Session after Session, until they were settled; and when at length a conviction of their wisdom and necessity had forced itself upon the public mind, there would be no discontent at their adoption. He hoped that next Session the hon. and learned Gentleman would not only again launch his barque upon its “sea of troubles,” but would carry it safe into port with flying colours, and have his name enrolled in the history of the country as the author of one of the most valuable improvements ever made in commercial law.

Sir John Pakington

MR. CAYLEY said, the hon. and learned Attorney General, in withdrawing his Bill, had cast some sort of imputation upon those who objected to Clause 152, as if they did not want to pay their debts. He agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman that all men ought to pay their debts; but what he complained of was that Clause 152 would have made solvent men, as well as insolvents, bankrupts. The discussions upon the Bill had hitherto been confined almost exclusively to lawyers. Very few laymen had taken part in it. It was not to be supposed that they could know all the secrets of the bankruptcy and insolvency laws, so as to make their objections to the non-trader point at an earlier period.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped that the Attorney General, before he again introduced a measure of this kind to Parliament, would address himself to the commercial laws of France and other Continental States, for he would find that the law he proposed was utterly at variance with the whole commercial law of Europe. He admitted the House was very much in fault in placing his hon. and learned Friend in his present dilemma, because they ought to have raised and discussed the question at a much earlier period.

MR. HENLEY said, that as the hon. and learned Gentleman had come to the conclusion to withdraw the Bill, he must say that he thought it a great blessing that the Committee was to be spared the occupation at this period of the Session of discussing the 402 clauses remaining to be considered, exclusive of the schedules. The hon. and learned Gentleman had made some complaint that the objection to the particular portion of the Bill to which reference had been made had not been taken earlier, and therefore he would state the reason why he took the objection at this stage of the Bill, and not before. He quite agreed that, for persons who wanted to go into a Court of law to be wound up, there should be but one form. That was why, when he heard the Insolvent Court was to be done away with, he agreed to that proposition; but though he agreed to that he differed as to the propriety of bringing the Bankruptcy Law to bear upon every man who owed only £20 in the world, and did not wish to be wound up one way or another. If a layman might be permitted to throw out a suggestion, he should say that as the commercial community wanted the Bankruptcy Law amended, and facilities for their arrangements being brought under the superintendence of the Court, and as it was desirable that the Courts of Insolvency and Bankruptcy should be amalgamated, those three subjects would make quite a sufficient handful of work for one time. If the hon. and learned Gentleman desired to get through that work he would act wisely in leaving the non-trading part of the matter out of his measure, and take it up at a more leisure period, after the other subjects were completely settled, because it involved a vast change in the law of this country. At the proper time he thought there would be good reasons to show against it; and its omission would afford facilities for the passing of those amendments which the commercial community wanted, while they did not care, he believed, one farthing about the other matter. If any man could have got through the whole of the 550 clauses of the present Bill he believed the hon. and learned Gentleman was that man. The hon. and learned Gentleman had drawn the clauses of the Bill with such ability and clearness that all persons, whether they liked them or not, could easily see what was intended to be done. Therefore no complaint could be made that any one was taken by surprise; and he was quite sure that if anybody could have got such a Bill through the House the hon. and learned Gentleman was the most likely to have done so; but there were some things so large that no man's power could roll them along. The Bill involved such vast consequences—blessings or curses, as people regarded them—that upon the discussion of the clauses the hon. and learned Gentleman would have found his difficulties increase. He would further observe that the word “debt” applied, no doubt, to traders and non-traders, but it meant two essentially different things in the two cases. When a trader contracted a debt, he agreed for the article, the price, and the specific time of payment, which last was the essence of the bargain; but the case was different with the non-trader. The latter bought goods without a specific time of payment being part of the bargain except in sales for ready money. When it was again attempted to adjust the differences existing in these two states of things—not a very easy task—he hoped the Attorney General would not run the risk of inflicting the hardship of applying the Bankruptcy Law to persons in no wise insolvent, though from no fault of their own they might have debts and so forth on their estates, for the sake of a smaller number of persons who might want a stringent law.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he trusted that when the Bill was reintroduced they would hear no more of the amalgamation of bankruptcy and insolvency, which were founded on totally different principles, and he also hoped they would hear no more of the extension of the Bankruptcy Law to non-traders. The two systems were founded on very different principles. The Insolvency Law was intended to be a pendent to the abolition of imprisonment, while the Bankruptcy Law, on the contrary, was a law in the interest of the creditor and to provide for the proper distribution of assets.

House resumed. [No Report.]

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. Henley

“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. DISRAELI said, he wished to take that opportunity of inquiring of the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether he intended to proceed with the Fortifications Bill to-morrow, and when he would lay on the table the Resolutions on the Paper Duties, which he had been expecting some time. If the noble Lord would answer these questions, he thought that it would tend greatly to the convenience of the House in the conduct of the public business.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—I shall postpone the statement upon Fortifications until Monday, and I believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will lay the Resolutions to which the right hon. Gentleman referred on the table to-morrow.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR asked whether, as the “massacre of the innocents” was shortly about to take place, it was consistent with the intention to withdraw Bills that two new Bills should be introduced to-night, the 19th of July? The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India had given notice of his intention to introduce an India Service Bill, confirming certain appointments in India. That was all very well, and the measure might be advisable, but why was it not brought in at an earlier period of the Session? The Bill also contemplated the amendment of the law concerning the Civil Service in India. He thought those words most ominous. Then there was the Bill for amalgamating the two armies in India remaining to be discussed. True, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India said that Gentlemen on his (Sir Minto Farquhar's) side of the House had been the occasion of the delays which had taken place; but that, however, was not true, because the right hon. Gentleman had himself been the cause of the delay, by refusing to lay papers on the table until he was very hardly pressed upon the matter. There had been a constant call for papers; but he had refused to place them in the hands of hon. Members until the last moment, the consequence of which was that the Army Bill was necessarily put off. He understood that on the question which had been raised the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Horsman) had moved only yesterday for papers of the most important character, and without the production of which it was impossible to proceed with the consideration of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had lately also introduced a Bill in reference to the transfer of Indian Stock. He (Sir Minto Farquhar) supposed that at two o'clock in the morning they would be asked by him to listen to a statement which was to affect the whole Civil Service of India. It was only the other day that they were asked at half-past two o'clock in the morning to discuss the question of Volunteer Corps for Ireland. Upon that occasion he (Sir Minto Farquhar) had asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he intended to introduce his Bill relating to the Indian Civil Service, and the reply was that he certainly did, and that the statement he had to make would not occupy more than two or three minutes. He (Sir Minto Farquhar) never was more astonished in his life than at such an avowal, because he happened to know that on that question, as on others, the right hon. Gentleman was at issue with his Council. All that he could say was, that he should do everything in his power to resist the progress of the measure. It was of the utmost importance that the Civil Service of India should not be interfered with. It was only in 1858 that the Bill for the better government of India was passed, which Bill introduced the principle of the competitive system, and now they were called on again to amend the law.

MR. SPEAKER said, that on the question now before the House the hon. Member must not enter into the details of the Bill.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR appealed to the noble Lord not to allow the introduction of such a measure at this late period of the Session.

In answer to Sir MINTO FARQUHAR,

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he believed that it was the intention of his right hon. Friend to make these two Motions that evening, but the House would probably think it better not to discuss them until they were actually submitted.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, I am not quite sure if I heard the noble Lord distinctly—I hope I did not hear him distinctly; but I understood him to say that the Bill for the Reorganization of the Indian Army would be taken the first thing to-morrow. Surely it is impossible for the noble Lord, under the circumstances, to persist in that intention. I am sure he knows that papers have been moved for and ordered, which are now in the printer's hands, which were withheld for a long time by the Secretary of State, but which are essential for the consideration of the Bill. Let me recal to the House the position in which it stands with regard to Indian legislation. There was much discussion the other day about the rights of a minority in this House. It is very seldom that hon. Gentlemen wish to enforce those rights to the utmost, and it is long since I joined a minority in such successive divisions as took place on this question the other night. But the right hon. Gentleman forced us to do so. We said he had papers which were absolutely essential to a right consideration of this question. The right hon. Gentleman said he had not got those papers; and upon a question of veracity between him and the House—I do not mean to attribute intentional want of veracity—but on a question of fact between them he kept us dividing to a late hour in the morning. During those divisions he reiterated over and over again that these papers were not in his possession; that he had seen nothing of them for three months; that they were in the printers' hands; and that the fault lay with the printing department. Upon his authority the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War also repeated the statement that the Printing Committee were responsible.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The right hon. Gentleman will state what I did say. I had no knowledge whatever of the special case, and did not pretend to speak with any knowledge. What I spoke to was the general duties of the printing Committee.

MR. HORSMAN: That is precisely what I said. The right hon. Gentleman spoke on the authority of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for India, he himself knowing nothing of the facts. We were placed in not a very agreeable position, labouring, as we did, under the imputation of acting factiously in order to obstruct this Bill, and throwing the blame on the right hon. Gentleman, when, in fact, it rested with the Printing Committee. Well, what really turned out to be the fact? Why, that those papers had been for weeks in the office of the Secretary of State for India; that three days before, according to his own admission in this House, when they were asked for by the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. H. Seymour), the printer made the application known to the Indian Department; it was then made known to the Secretary of State and his

the hon. and learned Gentleman was that man. The hon. and learned Gentleman had drawn the clauses of the Bill with such ability and clearness that all persons, whether they liked them or not, could easily see what was intended to be done. Therefore no complaint could be made that any one was taken by surprise; and he was quite sure that if anybody could have got such a Bill through the House the hon. and learned Gentleman was the most likely to have done so; but there were some things so large that no man's power could roll them along. The Bill involved such vast consequences—blessings or curses, as people regarded them—that upon the discussion of the clauses the hon. and learned Gentleman would have found his difficulties increase. He would further observe that the word “debt” applied, no doubt, to traders and non-traders, but it meant two essentially different things in the two cases. When a trader contracted a debt, he agreed for the article, the price, and the specific time of payment, which last was the essence of the bargain; but the case was different with the non-trader. The latter bought goods without a specific time of payment being part of the bargain except in sales for ready money. When it was again attempted to adjust the differences existing in these two states of things—not a very easy task—he hoped the Attorney General would not run the risk of inflicting the hardship of applying the Bankruptcy Law to persons in no wise insolvent, though from no fault of their own they might have debts and so forth on their estates, for the sake of a smaller number of persons who might want a stringent law.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he trusted that when the Bill was reintroduced they would hear no more of the amalgamation of bankruptcy and insolvency, which were founded on totally different principles, and he also hoped they would hear no more of the extension of the Bankruptcy Law to non-traders. The two systems were founded on very different principles. The Insolvency Law was intended to be a pendent to the abolition of imprisonment, while the Bankruptcy Law, on the contrary, was a law in the interest of the creditor and to provide for the proper distribution of assets.

House resumed. [No Report.]

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. Henley

“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. DISRAËLI said, he wished to take that opportunity of inquiring of the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether he intended to proceed with the Fortifications Bill to-morrow, and when he would lay on the table the Resolutions on the Paper Duties, which he had been expecting some time. If the noble Lord would answer these questions, he thought that it would tend greatly to the convenience of the House in the conduct of the public business.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—I shall postpone the statement upon Fortifications until Monday, and I believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will lay the Resolutions to which the right hon. Gentleman referred on the table to-morrow.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR asked whether, as the “massacre of the innocents” was shortly about to take place, it was consistent with the intention to withdraw Bills that two new Bills should be introduced to-night, the 19th of July? The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India had given notice of his intention to introduce an India Service Bill, confirming certain appointments in India. That was all very well, and the measure might be advisable, but why was it not brought in at an earlier period of the Session? The Bill also contemplated the amendment of the law concerning the Civil Service in India. He thought those words most ominous. Then there was the Bill for amalgamating the two armies in India remaining to be discussed. True, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India said that Gentlemen on his (Sir Minto Farquhar's) side of the House had been the occasion of the delays which had taken place; but that, however, was not true, because the right hon. Gentleman had himself been the cause of the delay, by refusing to lay papers on the table until he was very hardly pressed upon the matter. There had been a constant call for papers; but he had refused to place them in the hands of hon. Members until the last moment, the consequence of which was that the Army Bill was necessarily put off. He understood that on the question which had been raised the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Horsman) had moved only yesterday for papers of the most important character, and without the production of which it was impossible to proceed with the consideration of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had lately also introduced a Bill in reference to the transfer of Indian Stock. He (Sir Minto Farquhar) supposed that at two o'clock in the morning they would be asked by him to listen to a statement which was to affect the whole Civil Service of India. It was only the other day that they were asked at half-past two o'clock in the morning to discuss the question of Volunteer Corps for Ireland. Upon that occasion he (Sir Minto Farquhar) had asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he intended to introduce his Bill relating to the Indian Civil Service, and the reply was that he certainly did, and that the statement he had to make would not occupy more than two or three minutes. He (Sir Minto Farquhar) never was more astonished in his life than at such an avowal, because he happened to know that on that question, as on others, the right hon. Gentleman was at issue with his Council. All that he could say was, that he should do everything in his power to resist the progress of the measure. It was of the utmost importance that the Civil Service of India should not be interfered with. It was only in 1858 that the Bill for the better government of India was passed, which Bill introduced the principle of the competitive system, and now they were called on again to amend the law.

MR. SPEAKER said, that on the question now before the House the hon. Member must not enter into the details of the Bill.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR appealed to the noble Lord not to allow the introduction of such a measure at this late period of the Session.

In answer to Sir MINTO FARQUHAR,

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he believed that it was the intention of his right hon. Friend to make these two Motions that evening, but the House would probably think it better not to discuss them until they were actually submitted.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, I am not quite sure if I heard the noble Lord distinctly—I hope I did not hear him distinctly; but I understood him to say that the Bill for the Reorganization of the Indian Army would be taken the first thing to-morrow. Surely it is impossible for the noble Lord, under the circumstances, to persist in that intention. I am sure he knows that papers have been moved for and ordered, which are now in the printer's hands, which were withheld for a long time by the Secretary of State, but which are essential for the consideration of the Bill. Let me recal to the House the position in which it stands with regard to Indian legislation. There was much discussion the other day about the rights of a minority in this House. It is very seldom that hon. Gentlemen wish to enforce those rights to the utmost, and it is long since I joined a minority in such successive divisions as took place on this question the other night. But the right hon. Gentleman forced us to do so. We said he had papers which were absolutely essential to a right consideration of this question. The right hon. Gentleman said he had not got those papers; and upon a question of veracity between him and the House—I do not mean to attribute intentional want of veracity—but on a question of fact between them he kept us dividing to a late hour in the morning. During those divisions he reiterated over and over again that these papers were not in his possession; that he had seen nothing of them for three months; that they were in the printers' hands; and that the fault lay with the printing department. Upon his authority the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War also repeated the statement that the Printing Committee were responsible.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The right hon. Gentleman will state what I did say. I had no knowledge whatever of the special case, and did not pretend to speak with any knowledge. What I spoke to was the general duties of the printing Committee.

MR. HORSMAN: That is precisely what I said. The right hon. Gentleman spoke on the authority of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for India, he himself knowing nothing of the facts. We were placed in not a very agreeable position, labouring, as we did, under the imputation of acting factiously in order to obstruct this Bill, and throwing the blame on the right hon. Gentleman, when, in fact, it rested with the Printing Committee. Well, what really turned out to be the fact? Why, that those papers had been for weeks in the office of the Secretary of State for India; that three days before, according to his own admission in this House, when they were asked for by the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. H. Seymour), the printer made the application known to the Indian Department; it was then made known to the Secretary of State and his

Under-Secretary; they found that those papers were in the hands of the Military Secretary; they went to him desiring him to return them; and they did this within three days of these divisions, during which divisions we were told that the right hon. Gentleman had seen or heard nothing of them for three months. Yet he had kept us in the House insisting that he knew nothing of these papers, and that we were entirely in the wrong in insisting upon their production.

What occurred, again, with respect to other papers? There were certain papers which we also thought most essential for the discussion of this question. In 1858 a correspondence took place between the Commander-in-Chief, the Secretary for War, and the Secretary for India. As soon as the Act of 1858 was passed, the Commander-in-Chief wrote to the War Secretary, who forwarded his letter to the Secretary for India, claiming that the Indian army should be put under the Horse Guards. A notice for the production of that correspondence was placed on the paper by me on the 28th of June. The right hon. Gentleman told me it did not exist. I told him I knew it did exist, and that it was in his own office, and I begged I might have that correspondence. The right hon. Gentleman still insisted that there was no such correspondence; declaring that he had referred to the War Secretary, who had no such letters in his department. I told him that the correspondence was in his own office. He insisted that it was not. I was placed in some difficulty, when at last I got the dates of the correspondence; and the day before yesterday I showed them to the War Secretary. There was a letter from the War Secretary, General Peel, written on the 10th of August, 1858, enclosing a letter from the Duke of Cambridge to Lord Stanley, then President of the Board of Control, dated "Horse Guards, August 2." There is a reply from Lord Stanley of the 17th of August, and another letter from General Peel of the 23rd of August. Lord Stanley's letter was considered unsatisfactory, and General Peel sent a rejoinder; and then Lord Stanley submitted the whole question to the law officers of the Crown, and that was laid regularly before the Council for India. I showed this to the Secretary of State for War. I am very sorry to speak of these things; but when we have to deal with the Secretary of State for India, we are not met with, I will not say that courtesy, but not even with that fairness and plain dealing, which we have a right to expect either from a gentleman, or a Minister of the Crown. I am only repeating now what I have stated before. It was absolutely essential in this matter that we should get our information in an indirect manner on purpose to correct the misinformation we receive from the Secretary of State. Nothing can be more characteristic than some correspondence which I will read to the House, which I happen to have in my pocket, although I certainly did not expect that I should have to read it to-night. As I said before, the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India has withheld information, he has misled us, and at the same time he has endeavoured to press on these Bills at a time when we were not only imperfectly informed, but actually misinformed, upon the facts. Now, here is a correspondence which I think is very characteristic. The day before yesterday I showed to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War the list of papers, and asked if there was any objection to my having them, stating that I would place a notice on the paper on Tuesday. He said, "Of course, you will put it in the Votes," and I said, "I will, and move to-morrow." Accordingly, yesterday I moved, but the right hon. Secretary of State for War, it appears, informed his right hon. Colleague of what I had shown him, and yesterday I got this letter:—

Mr. Horsman

"Sir C. Wood presents his compliments to Mr. Horsman, and begs to inform him that he has found in his own office the correspondence between the Secretary of State for the War Department and the Secretary of State for India in 1858,"—the fact is I found it and communicated it the day before yesterday to the Secretary for War,— "a Motion for the production of which Mr. Horsman gave notice of. Mr. Horsman will recollect that on his asking Sir C. Wood if he had any objection to give them, Sir C. Wood said that he had only just seen the notice, but that he understood from Mr. Herbert that there was no such correspondence in existence. Sir C. Wood only became aware of the existence of these papers yesterday, and loses no time in apprising Mr. Horsman. He has no objection to their being produced if Mr. Horsman wishes to move for them as an unopposed return."

I must express my great obligations to the right hon. Gentleman for informing me that he had found them. I had told him three weeks before that they were there, and the day after my giving the precise dates of the letters which enabled him to make a search that resulted in their being found, he is kind enough to communicate the fact to me, as a piece of good news for which I should be grateful to him. I must say that, considering the right hon. Gentleman received his information from myself, and that this is the second time we have been placed in this very unfair position, and not forgetting that he compelled us to go on dividing at two o'clock, apparently putting us in the wrong by saying we were asking for papers which were not at that time in his office,—remembering all these things, that letter rather surprised me. I wrote this letter in reply:—

“July 18, 1860.

“Mr. Horsman presents his compliments to Sir C. Wood. He has already, at twelve o'clock to-day, moved for the return set down in his name. He did so by Mr. Sidney Herbert's permission, to whom he yesterday showed the exact dates of the letters he asked for, thus proving the existence of what was so strangely unknown to Sir C. Wood. Mr. Horsman protests most strongly against the very careless and inconsiderate manner in which Sir C. Wood deals with Members of the House of Commons in regard to papers that are absolutely essential to a fair consideration of the questions he submits to them. If this return had been granted when it first appeared on the notice-paper, and on the day when Sir C. Wood informed Mr. Horsman the correspondence did not exist, it would ere this have been in the hands of Members. The correspondence (in no sense confidential) was a matter of notoriety—the most casual inquiry in his office must have made it known to Sir C. Wood, and the complaint would have been obviated of his having a second time placed the House at a disadvantage by his strange inability to account for indispensable papers that were in his own possession. It is obvious that if Sir C. Wood presses his India Bills at this late period of the Session very grave questions will be raised, not merely on the merits of the Bills on which he is at issue with the India Council, but also on his relations with the Council, whom he appears to have reduced to an insignificance not contemplated by the Act of 1858, and also on his relations to the House of Commons, which he has not allowed to be possessed of the information it has a right to. The further progress of the Bills must in such circumstances be very strongly and resolutely opposed, and there is every reason for at once including them among those which Lord Palmerston is expected to-morrow to announce his intention of dropping for this Session.”

The Cabinet was sitting when I received the right hon. Gentleman's letter, and as I sent my answer at once and by hand, I hope it was submitted to the noble Lord. I then received a second note from the right hon. Gentleman, as follows:—

“Sir Charles Wood presents his compliments to Mr. Horsman, and wishes simply to correct a mistake into which he has fallen as to a matter of fact. Sir C. Wood certainly relied on the information which he received from Mr. Herbert, that the correspondence on the subject of placing the Indian armies under the Horse Guards in 1858, between the Departments of War and India, did not exist. It is impossible, however, that Mr. Herbert could have assented yesterday morning to the production of papers of the existence of which he was then unaware, and only learned from Sir C. Wood this morning. Sir C. Wood understands from Mr. Herbert that what passed between him and Mr. Horsman was not that Mr. Herbert assented to any papers being produced, but that he promised to give an answer to Mr. Horsman in the evening, which he had not an opportunity of doing.

“Downing Street, July 18, 1860.”

A verbal inaccuracy is not much, but I showed the paper containing the dates of the correspondence on Tuesday to the right hon. Secretary of State for War, and therefore it was from me that the right hon. Gentleman received his information, and not from his right hon. Colleague. Now, I must press on the noble Lord and the House whether, having asked on the 28th of June for these papers which are essential, having been put off in this manner from day to day by the right hon. Gentleman, having at last succeeded in showing the existence of the papers, and having, with his permission, moved for them only yesterday, I would urge the noble Lord to consider whether he is justified in asking us to-morrow to go on with this Bill.

I heard just now two hon. Gentlemen express their determination to enforce to the utmost the rights of a minority upon this occasion. I would appeal to the House whether there was ever an occasion upon which it was more justifiable to enforce those rights than the present. It is not a question as to the merits of the Bill, but it is a question whether, if only two hon. Members of this House want to give a fair consideration to the Bill, they are not entitled to have an opportunity of receiving information in order to discuss the matter properly. But what else is the right hon. Gentleman doing? We are now arrived at the 19th of July, and the Government are dropping those Orders of the Day for Bills which they feel at this period of the Session are too important to be passed through without discussion. I believe the earliest period at which the House can possibly rise is very late in August, but at the very time that the Government are dropping these important Bills they are introducing others, and upon the notice-book for to-night there stands at least one measure much more important than any which are not to be proceeded with. The whole administration of the Indian army is to be transferred to the Horse Guards, but what is now going to be done with the Indian Civil Service? The Government proposes to appropriate the whole administration of that civil service.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the right hon. Gentleman, as I did the hon. Member for Hertford, that when a measure is on the table of this House it is not competent to discuss its merits until the order comes on in due course.

MR. HORSMAN: I am speaking, Sir, of a Bill which is not upon the table, but which the Government have given notice they intend to introduce. I think, when we are taking counsel with the Government as to what measures shall be proceeded with and what shall be withdrawn, it is open to me to remonstrate with the Government when they seek to introduce new matters of debate, and I say that, if we now enter upon a discussion of a measure to put an end to the competitive system in the Indian civil service—that system which has been built up with so much difficulty by Parliament, as the best safeguard against inefficiency and jobbery—if we are to enter upon a discussion of the question on the 19th of July, it is a mockery for Government to drop other Bills because there is not time to discuss them. It shows what is the present system in the Indian Department. Bills are introduced late in the Session, without previous notice, without information, without papers being furnished, and they are to be hurried and smuggled through the House, these most important measures, because the right hon. Gentleman feels that there is only a very small section of the House who take an interest in Indian questions and understand them, and he is able to come down with a majority to overpower the minority, and to pass just what he pleases. There is another thing. It was a very important point which was just raised by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir James Elphinstone) which it behoves the House to consider well—whether it is not in itself a reason for proceeding carefully with legislation on a subject when it is known that the Secretary of State is at issue with the whole Council upon it. I believe the House would not have agreed to transfer the government of India to the Crown unless they had believed that the Council would have been a security that Indian affairs would be administered by those who knew something of India. Yet, for the first time, we now hear that the members of this Council are turned into clerks, smothered with papers, and reduced into a position of mere insignificance, as if they were at the beck and nod of the right hon. Gentleman, and held office at his pleasure. When, therefore certain measures have been withdrawn, and other Bills with regard to India, of a very large and important character, are announced to be proceeded with, and upon which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India is at variance with the Indian Council, I would earnestly press on the Government the propriety and policy of postponing them to another Session. I must say, expressing an opinion I have heard uttered by many other Gentlemen in this House, that instead of allowing one Secretary of State to overbear the opinions and outweigh the authority of fifteen members of the Council, if the House were polled they would allow the opinions of one member of Council to outweigh those of fifteen Secretaries of State even of the calibre of the right hon. Gentleman, who by some extraordinary piece of fortune, which nobody understands, fills that high office. I beg to repeat that I should be extremely sorry to join in the opposition threatened by hon. Gentlemen opposite, but I am ready to appeal to the House and the country, and I say that, however a small section of the House that takes an interest in this question and has studied it might, in other circumstances, yield to a majority which feels these measures should pass, they ought not, in this instance, to give way, seeing the manner in which the Government has chosen to overbear us in this House, both as to measures and papers—by a treatment. I must say, very different from what we had a right to expect.

Mr. Horsman

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I cannot help expressing the surprise and regret I feel that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud should have taken the present opportunity, without any notice, of making the attack he has done on my right hon. Friend in his absence. The right hon. Gentleman came down here with documents which it was clearly his intention to read to the House, making, not a fair criticism on the public conduct of my right hon. Friend, but an attack on his private character and honour, which I am only the less surprised to hear, because we have been in the habit of hearing attacks from the right hon. Gentleman of a character different from those of any other Gentleman in this House. With regard to the first subject of attack, my right hon. Friend himself made an explanation to the House. He took the earliest opportunity, after ascertaining the facts, of stating them to the House, with regard to the papers the production of which was called for on the second reading of the Bill; and I believe my right hon. Friend entirely satisfied the House upon the subject. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman, after that statement, which was, I believe, entirely satisfactory to the House—should have thought it necessary to repeat charges against my right hon. Friend in his absence—coming down to the House armed with correspondence and documents by which he endeavoured—but I am sure I may appeal to the House to confirm me when I say vainly endeavoured—to depreciate the honour of my right hon. Friend, and establish against him a charge of fraud, which I am sure the right hon. Gentleman himself will regret when he comes calmly to reflect on his conduct. I say nothing more on that point, but I feel, from the long experience I have had in this House, that what I have said must meet with the general concurrence of hon. Members.

With regard to the question which has been raised as to the progress of certain Bills, I must say, if we are to do any business at all, it will be better to confine our attention to what is before us, and not anticipate discussions on Bills placed on the Paper either for this evening or to-morrow. The hon. Baronet the Member for Hertford (Sir Minto Farquhar) objects to two Notices on the Paper to-night. I have not the advantage which it seems the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud possesses of knowing the precise contents of the Bill of which notice has been given. I very much doubt whether his statement of the contents will be found to be correct. I do not profess to know what the contents may be; but, admitting fully that it would be inexpedient now to introduce Bills which are not indispensably necessary, it is premature to anticipate the discussion which will arise when the subject comes regularly before us. My right hon. Friend will state what are the general objects and purport of these Bills, and why he considers it desirable that they should be introduced now. [Several hon. MEMBERS: At what hour?] I do not know at what hour as that must depend on the progress of other business. When he makes that statement he will give his reasons why they ought to be passed this Session, and when the measures are introduced, even if they are not proceeded with, it may be of advantage to the public to know what the proposals are. When they have been introduced will be the proper time to raise the objection, and the House may, if so disposed, decline to proceed with them. So with regard to the Indian Army Amalgamation Bill, if it is brought forward to-morrow, and if the right hon. Gentleman thinks there are papers which it is essential the House should have in its possession before that Bill be proceeded with in Committee, he may state the reasons which have led him to that opinion, and the House has it in its own power then to prevent the Bill from being proceeded with; but it is too much for the right hon. Gentleman to say "I hold it essential that these papers should be produced, and I insist now that that Bill shall not proceed to-morrow." If it be on the Paper to-morrow, and if my right hon. Friend move that it be proceeded with, then will be the time for the right hon. Gentleman to object, and state his reasons for thinking it should not be proceeded with. I do hope the House will not allow the regular course of business to be interfered with by irrelevant discussions as to the relative position and power of the Secretary of State and the Indian Council. I believe, when the subject comes to be discussed, it will be found that my right hon. Friend has acted in strict conformity with the law on this subject. I am only sorry that my right hon. Friend had no notice of the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to read the documents which he has read, and to bring his charges against him in the manner he has done.

MR. HORSMAN said, he had not seen the Bills, but he spoke of the India Civil Service Bill as a matter of notoriety, and he stated only what he did because he was surprised to learn from the noble Lord that the Indian Army Bill was to be proceeded with the first thing to-morrow night.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he had not seen the Bill, but he understood that there was a clause in it which would affect the civil service in India.

MR. T. G. BARING: I can assure hon. Members there is not the slightest wish to withhold papers connected with the Indian army question, but, on the contrary, every information has been given which it is in the power of the Secretary of State for India to produce. In fact, those who have looked at the papers must admit that they have been produced, I may almost say ad nauseam. So far from withholding information, even confidential papers have been produced which it was unusual to give in similar cases. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud has mis-stated the explanation given by my right hon. Friend as to the papers relating to the discharge of men last year. The papers were not in the possession of my right hon. Friend at all.

MR. HORSMAN: I said they were in the possession of the Military Secretary, in the Secretary of State's office.

MR. T. G. BARING: As the right hon. Gentleman says they were not in my right hon. Friend's possession, I am satisfied with that explanation. The truth is, a large mass of papers were ordered to be printed, and some delay arose in the correction of the proofs in the India Office, which was brought to my notice two or three days before the debate came on, when it was at once put an end to. On my own authority, I can say that my right hon. Friend had no knowledge whatever of those papers. They were entirely in the hands of the Military Secretary, Colonel Baker, and I myself had no knowledge of the proofs being corrected at the India Office until within a few days of the debate. With regard to the other papers alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman, as soon as my right hon. Friend ascertained that they existed he communicated the fact to the right hon. Gentleman, and stated that if he would move for them they would be given as an unopposed return. It should, however, be remembered that the correspondence did not take place with the present Secretary of State for India, and, being a correspondence between departments, the matter was naturally referred to the Secretary of State for War. I think the right hon. Gentleman should be careful how he brings such charges against my right hon. Friend, without the slightest ground of any sort or description. As the right hon. Gentleman assumes—and it is an entire assumption on his part—that these papers are so essential, I may take on myself the responsibility of stating that the Indian Army Bill will not be proceeded with to-morrow night. The production of these papers, however, could have no effect on the decision already arrived at by a large majority of the House on this important question.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON: I wish to say, Sir, that a previous conversation which I had with the right hon. Member for Stroud amply bore out what he has now stated. I had intended to place on the

Mr. T. G. Baring

Paper a notice for to-morrow on the subject of the Indian Army Bill, and the right hon. Gentleman told me that the Bill could not come on to-morrow because he could not believe the Government would press it forward without first presenting the papers which were at the India House. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the correspondence he has just read, and said it was his intention to show these letters to the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, as he thought that would be more courteous than to read them to the House. I think, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman has said no more than he actually felt, and that it was only in consequence of the unexpected statement which has been made on the part of the Government that he read the documents which he has done to-night. After the answer given by the noble Lord to the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), I do not think the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor for the Duchy had a right to administer the reproof which he gave to the right hon. Member for Stroud. The noble Lord, when objection was raised to Supply being taken on the ground that many hon. Gentlemen did not expect it to be brought on, replied that hon. Members ought to be in their places. Considering that the Secretary of State for India must have known, although the House could not, that the Bankruptcy Bill was to be withdrawn, he must have supposed that, if important legislation with respect to India were to be pressed forward, the House would give to that legislation some discussion. I think, therefore, that the right hon. Member for Stroud has not been proved to have taken any unfair advantage of the absence of the Secretary of State for India.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I cannot but think that there is a further portion of this correspondence which the right hon. Gentleman has not read. There must be another letter to this effect:—Mr. Horsman presents his compliments to Sir Charles Wood, and begs to give him notice that it is his intention to make a personal attack upon him in the House to-night. And another still to this effect:—Mr. Horsman presents his compliments to Mr. Sidney Herbert, and begs to give him notice that he means to refer to-night in the House of Commons to a private conversation he has had with him. It is much to be lamented that the right hon. Gentleman has not read those letters, because they would have placed his conduct in a clear light before the House. But it is so constantly done in such cases that it is impossible the right hon. Gentleman can have omitted what is so necessary and, at the same time, so usual a practice among gentlemen. There is another point on which, though I wish to avoid all discussion on it at the present moment, I feel that the reproaches directed against my right hon. Friend the Secretary for India are wholly undeserved. It is said that my right hon. Friend does not attend to the advice of his Indian Council. But I must remind the House that it is the business of my right hon. Friend on grave questions of policy to consider, not the opinion of his council, nor even his own opinion, but the opinion of Her Majesty's confidential advisers, who must ultimately decide all questions of policy, whether they regard the interests of India or the general interests of the empire. With regard to this particular question, we heard lately a very fair and candid statement from the right hon. and gallant General the Member for Huntingdon, who stated that among the witnesses who came to give evidence before the Indian Army Commission, one thing was plain, that every man who held a military position in India, or a civil position there, was of opinion that there ought to be a local army in India, and, on the other hand, every man who held a position in the military service of this country was of opinion that there ought to be no local army. That was a question, therefore, which my right hon. Friend had to decide, not on his own authority, but according to the advice of others; and the question really comes to this, whether it is right that my right hon. Friend should consult first the Members of the Cabinet individually, and then place the question for decision before the whole Cabinet, or whether he should in the first instance lay the matter before the Indian Council and consult them, and then turn round and say, I have got the opinion of the Indian Council and I shall act upon it, no matter what may be the opinion of the other Cabinet Ministers and advisers of the Crown. That was the alternative before my right hon. Friend, and I leave it to the House which it was his duty to adopt.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES: I trust, Sir, this great question will not be embarrassed by personal considerations. After much doubt and difficulty in the course of the discussion on the Bill for the better

Government of India, we decided that the Members of the Indian Council should not be eligible for seats in this House. I regretted that decision at the time, and I regret it now, because if gentlemen of such weight and dignity as those who composed that Council were here, I am sure these discussions would be conducted in a far better manner than they now possibly can be, when we are compelled to trust so much to rumour and private information, and can understand the relations between the Minister for India and his Council only by those indirect means which necessarily carry with them great personal inconvenience. Much excuse might, therefore, be made for the hon. Member for Stroud, who could by these indirect means alone inform himself thoroughly of what I believe to be the main point in this question—namely, the difference between the Minister for India and the Council given him to advise him. If one isolated measure had been submitted to the House it might have stood on its own merits, and required no collateral discussion; but when we see the Government compelled by necessity to give up a Bill in which I believe the interests of this House are as much concerned as in any Bill ever laid before Parliament, and find that new Bills are to be introduced at the eleventh hour of the Session, which require for their discussion much time and all the information which can be brought to bear upon them, I say I am impressed with the conviction that there must be some intention which we do not entirely understand in the adoption of such a policy by the Indian Minister. It is impossible to avoid feeling that the object of the Government and of the Indian Minister in bringing forward a series of measures upon which he is known to differ from his Council, is to depreciate that Council in public estimation, and to enable the right hon. Gentleman to assume the position of Monarch of India, which I am certain this House never intended he should hold.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, I wish to explain. I saw both the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for War in this House shortly before I rose to address it. I believed they were both here.

MR. DISRAELI: I agree with the noble Lord—indeed, it is unquestionable—that it is most agreeable to every Gentleman's feelings, when he has a personal charge to make, that he should make it in the presence of the persons concerned. But at the same time I am bound to express my own impression as regards the conduct of the right hon. Member for Stroud, that he certainly did not come forward this evening to make a charge of a personal character with any notion that the Minister whom it affected would be absent. The noble Lord commenced our debates this evening by laying it down as the duty of a Member of Parliament always to be in his place. I agree with the noble Lord that that is a position which ought as much as possible to be enforced, because there would be no end to the postponements of public business if the presence or absence of hon. Members interested in it were to be accepted as a sufficient excuse. Allegations of that kind are, I think, much too frequently heard. But as regards numbers of Members in a popular Chamber, the noble Lord's doctrine that they ought always to be present must, to some extent be only a theory, whereas Ministers of the Crown ought, generally speaking, to be always here in practice. It must have been a secret to everybody but the Members of the Government that the Bankruptcy Bill would be to-night withdrawn. The next order on the Paper is Supply, and during its consideration every Minister ought to be in his place, because it is impossible to tell what questions may not then be brought forward affecting the general policy of the country. The two right hon. Gentlemen who have been alluded to were not in this House when the right hon. Member for Stroud made his statement, although it seems they were here shortly before. Had that right hon. Member postponed his statement till to-morrow I feel bound to say, I think that if his great object was to secure the adjournment of the measure on the Indian army, that statement would have been made with much less effect than when made to-day. Because, when the House had met and the Government had announced their first measure to be that relating to the Indian army, whatever might have been the statement made, and however much time might have been lost in personal recriminations, I doubt whether the Government would have felt it consistent with their dignity to withdraw a measure of which they had given notice. They have now had an opportunity, of which I think they have wisely availed themselves, to announce to the House that they will not press on that measure to-morrow; but will allow us to have those papers, on the production of which it is but fair that we should insist.

Mr. Disraeli

I would make one observation on the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman. It appears to me that, in consequence of the declaration of the noble Lord, and feeling the responsibility of his own position in regard to this measure, it was very difficult for the right hon. Member for Stroud not to make the personal statement which he has done to-night, although we must certainly all regret that the Ministers who are concerned were not present. For my own part—and I believe I only express the feeling of every hon. Member—I shall form no opinion unfavourable to those Ministers until they have had an opportunity of being heard. I cannot help, however, stating my impression, which I believe is shared by many, that the relations of the Indian Administration with this House are not in so satisfactory a state as they might be. After the passing of the Act of 1858 it was quite clear that the relations between the House of Commons and the Government of India assumed a different character from that of the preceding period, when the East India Company ruled with the prescription of long years, exercised with weight and authority, and resting on a system of administration which had been approved by experience. It is quite clear that after the change the responsibility of Parliament generally in the administration of India was much increased. Therefore it became the duty of the Government to take care that any measures which required the sanction of Parliament should be introduced at a period when they could be amply and sufficiently discussed, and should be preceded by ample and sufficient information. No doubt, the unfortunate circumstances which have influenced this Session with respect to business generally have had their effect upon these measures for the administration of India, but, although I am not disposed to attribute to the Government the Machiavelian design which has been imputed to them by the hon. Member who has just spoken, still the fact remains that at the end of the Session the House is called upon to discuss most serious and most important measures. That is a state of affairs which is very much to be regretted, and therefore the Government ought not to be surprised if there is some impatience—even some jealousy among those hon. Members who are peculiarly interested in the affairs of India when they find that there is a chance of the House being hurried into a decision upon those measures in a manner which can hardly be satisfactory even to those who approve them. Under these circumstances I highly approve the decision of the Government not to force on the discussion of the first of those measures to-morrow. No doubt, before that debate comes on papers will be produced, and we shall approach the question with advantages which we do not now possess. In the meantime I shall express my hope and my belief that when the right hon. Gentlemen whose conduct has been referred to, and whose absence we regret, appear in their places, we shall receive from them a perfectly satisfactory account of the circumstances which have been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud. We all know from our own experience that great misconceptions may arise between Gentlemen, which may easily be removed by personal explanation, but which correspondence, even if as complete as the noble Lord has suggested that it ought to be, sometimes only increases. I trust and believe that when an opportunity arises explanations will be given which will be quite satisfactory, and I am sure that the House generally will approve the course which has been adopted by the Government with regard to the European Forces (India) Bill.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The right hon. Gentleman seems to imagine that I stated broadly that it is the duty of every Member of the House to be present upon every occasion. I did not mean to impose such a tax upon the time and endurance of hon. Members. What I said was that those who intended to take part in the discussion of any measure which stood upon the Paper for the evening ought to come down, because they could not be sure that the Orders which preceded it might not go off, either on account of the unavoidable absence of those who had charge of them, or from some other cause.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY wished to ask whether it was intended by the Government to propose a loan for India this year. Looking to the finances, he thought such a measure would be necessary, and, if so, the House ought to have early notice. With regard to the statement made by the right hon. Member for Stroud, he was sure it had been made through an earnest anxiety to show the necessity for delaying the consideration of the measure to abolish the Indian army. There was a question that had never yet received the attention of the House, though he could hardly conceive a more important one: he meant the effect which the addition of 100,000 men to the control and patronage of the Horse Guards would have both on the Indian Empire and on our own Government; and anything which tended to show what were the opinions of the Commander-in-Chief or of other persons in this country on that subject was of the highest importance. Some observations had fallen from the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs with regard to the Indian Council. That noble Lord two years ago voted in a strong minority against the proposition that the Members of the Indian Council should not have seats in this House. [Lord JOHN RUSSELL: Hear, hear!] He thought the House had reason enough to regret the decision to which they then came, because they were suffering the disadvantage of discussing the composition of the Indian army without having the opinions of that Council, many of whom were men of great eminence. For his part he could not see that either the Cabinet or the House would have been at all the worse if they had taken the opinions of those distinguished men before they came to any decision on the subject.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: If the hon. Baronet will put his question with regard to the loan to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India to-night, or will give notice of it for another evening, he will, no doubt, receive a proper answer. I will only venture to say a few words to the House with reference to the powers of the Council of India. Under the former Act it was in the power of the President of the Board of Control completely to overrule the Court of Directors, and to order them to write any despatch that he thought fit; therefore it is quite a mistake to suppose that the Secretary of State for India possesses power which was not enjoyed by the President of the Board of Control. One consideration which has been overlooked is that the Council of India is merely a council for advising the Secretary of State upon matters relating to the administration of the affairs of India, those matters which are within the operation of the Act, and upon which the Secretary of State has to take some positive measure. With regard to any legislation, any Bill which he has to bring into this House that is not an administrative act, is not an act which he does in his capacity of Secretary of State for India, but in his capacity of a Member of this House. Of course, he is bound to consult his colleagues in the Cabinet, but it is not a matter which he can in any way regularly bring under the view of the Council. If hon. Gentlemen will look at the words of the Act they will see that it is not competent to the Secretary of State for India to consult his Council as to whether he shall propose a Bill for introduction into this House; nor could they, under the words of the Act, record their dissent from the course which he proposed to adopt. All he can do is, when they are assembled, to inform them, if he thinks fit, of his intention, and to profit by their advice. What I understand from my right hon. Friend the Secretary for India is, that he was in private conversation apprised of the opinions of the Members of his Council upon this question of the army before he brought in the Bill. He knew that they were unfavourable to his proposition, but it was not competent to him within the terms of the Act to propose to the Council that he should bring a Bill into Parliament and enable them to record their dissent from that course. Therefore, in discussing this question the House should distinctly bear in mind the difference between the legislative proposals which the Secretary of State introduces into this House as a Member of the House, such as the Bills he seeks to introduce to-night, and the orders which he sends to the Governor General, or the other Governors in India, or any other act which he does in this country in his administrative capacity as Secretary of State for India.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he must deprecate, without any reference to the right hon. Gentleman at present Secretary of State for India, the manner in which measures relating to India were dealt with. Not only were they introduced at a late period, but the information which was necessary for their proper consideration was delayed till it was almost useless. The House had been entrapped into a hasty decision upon the second reading of the European Forces Bill. It was only on the morning of the division that important papers relating to what was so strangely called the mutiny of the European troops were placed in the hands of Members. They ought, he thought, to give a fair consideration to the views of hon. Gentlemen founded on papers recently presented to the House, and which were very much at variance with statements that had been hitherto made, and threw an entirely new light upon the question. The other papers had such a direct bearing upon the matter to be discussed that they certainly ought to be placed in the hands of Members before any further discussion took place. There was also no doubt that if the opinion of the Council had been favourable to his policy the right hon. Baronet would have been the first to have come down to the House and to have made it a great point.

Sir George Lewis

MR. HENLEY said, that it appeared to him that the remarks of the Home Secretary would give occasion to hon. Members to sharpen their wits by the very subtle distinctions he had laid down in the construction to be placed on the Act of Parliament. He told the House that the President of the Board of Control could compel the Directors to send out what orders he liked to India, and therefore the Secretary of State had no more power now than the President had before. No one doubted that, but it was not the point. He also laid it down that the duty of the Council was to advise the Secretary of State for India in matters of administration in India, but that when it came to matters of legislation, then he did not propose measures as Secretary of State for India, but as a Member of Parliament. Now, that was an uncommonly subtle distinction. Was the House, then, to understand that this Bill was brought in by the Secretary of State for India, or by the Member for Halifax? That was the first question. And then, where was the distinction between matters of administration in India and matters of legislation, if the former required the help of legislation to carry them out? Suppose that some question of dealing with the religious prejudices of the Natives of India arose, upon which the legislative authority of that House was required. It was most unlikely that any such authority would be given; but was that the sort of question upon which the Council was or was not to be consulted? The explanation of the right hon. Gentleman seemed so far to narrow the ground that it was very difficult to say on what questions the Council were to be consulted.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he wished to explain that when he alluded to legislative power he spoke of legislation in that House of Parliament, and not of legislation in India; and he had referred to the measures which his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Wood) had introduced, not simply as Secretary of State, but as a Member of that House [Mr. HENLEY: Hear!]

—such measures as he would be unable to introduce if he were merely Secretary of State for India, and not a Member of that House.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER, in rising to move that the Report of the Committee on Greenwich Hospital be carried into effect, said that the Report reflected great credit upon its authors. Greenwich Hospital was founded by William III. at the request of his Queen. Certain rules were laid down, describing the object and management of the hospital, from which it was evident that Greenwich Hospital was founded for the benefit of disabled and wounded seamen, to provide for the orphans of those who were killed and wounded, and also for the wives, widows, and children of disabled seamen. These children were to be received, educated, and taught to maintain themselves. Subsequent provisions were made that the children of merchant seamen who had been killed in action or drowned should be received in the hospital, and it was also clear that the advantages of the hospital were not to be obtained by any naval persons above the degree of master's mate. In 1705, 100 seamen were entered in Greenwich Hospital under the regulation then made: in 1706 another 100 were entered, and so on until in the year 1814, 2,710 had been entered. The number had been since fixed at 2,642. In 1814 the Government granted pensions to seamen for length of service amounting to 9d. a day for fifteen years' service, and 1s. a day for twenty years' service, and those pensions were given on precisely the same grounds as the half pay to officers after a war. From 1814 to 1829, no less than £2,000,000 of Greenwich Hospital money had been paid as pensions to seamen for length of service by the Government. It was then found out that the pensions were illegally paid out of these funds, and an Act of Parliament was passed exculpating the Government, which had since paid the pensions out of the usual Estimates. The number of vacancies in Greenwich Hospital had gone on increasing from only eleven vacancies in 1848 to 1,124 vacancies in 1860. Would any one believe that if the funds of Greenwich Hospital had been properly administered, there would now be

1,124 vacancies? The seamen of the most valuable class, according to the Commissioners, were unwilling to enter Greenwich Hospital under the existing regulations, and hence the diminution in the number of inmates. It was plain, however, that 9d. or even 1s. a day was not sufficient to maintain men in the same comfort as they would have in Greenwich Hospital if the rules were properly administered. He was not going to find fault with the present or the late Board of Admiralty, but he found fault with all the Boards of Admiralty for the last sixty or seventy years, because they had not paid to Greenwich Hospital the attention which it deserved. But that was always to be expected whenever any Board had too much to do. Those Governments had not even taken the pains to inform seamen scattered throughout the country of their right of admission to the hospital. A poor wounded sailor living in the north of Scotland or at the Land's End knew no more of Greenwich Hospital than the Man in the Moon. Even if seamen did know and wished to enter, they were usually obliged to beg their way up to town, and that was a thing which the defenders of their country ought not to be reduced to. In the hospital all distinctions of rank were effaced, and badges of good conduct carried with them neither emolument nor practical distinction. Was that the way in which the seamen of England—men who had served for twenty or thirty years in all parts of the world—ought to be treated? Another grievance was that when a pensioner obtained leave of absence to visit his relatives his rations were stopped, and he was allowed no payment in lieu of them. The consequence was that he was obliged to beg his way back to the hospital. He thought that seamen and the public were under a deep debt of gratitude to the hon. Member for Gateshead and his colleagues on the Commission for their Report, and the way in which they had laid bare the iniquitous system which had been going on in the hospital for seventy or eighty years. Until he (Sir Charles Napier) brought the subject forward last year, nothing was comparatively known of that system, and even then the Government asked him very hard for a reprieve. Nothing could be more irksome than the lives of these poor people, shut up as they were in a state of idleness in the hospital. It was not very astonishing then to find them flocking to the public-houses when they got out, because after their mere material wants had been cared for in the hospital, they had no kind of amusement or employment to while away the time. Indeed, the Admiralty seemed to take a delight in depriving these poor men of everything which could make life bearable, for it was not many years ago that some little employment in supplying small articles to the navy was taken away from them, although they were only paid half what the article cost when it was supplied by others. Then with regard to the wives and widows of the seamen, for whose benefit also the hospital had been designed, the Report of the Commissioners stated that the wives were wholly ignored, that they received nothing but the broken food and offal of the hospital. And even when they washed their husband's linen they received no portion of the money, which was thereby saved to the hospital. He admitted that when an outpensioner went into Greenwich Hospital, he should give up his pension to the hospital in return for the subsistence and comforts he obtained there; but if a seaman had been wounded, and had lost, perhaps, a limb, he maintained that the pension given to the seamen on that account should not be taken from him on his entering Greenwich Hospital. These pensions were given to the seamen in the same way as to officers, and it was extraordinary, if the latter retained the pensions, that the former were not allowed to do so. The Commissioners stated that the officers had no business in Greenwich Hospital as pensioners. By Act of Parliament no persons above the rank of a master's mate had any right there as pensioners or on the foundation, though they might be in the hospital to do the necessary duties of supervision as governor or captain. If the whole of the funds of Greenwich Hospital were laid hold of and divided among the men, they would receive a much larger allowance, and would be made more comfortable, than at present. But in a national point of view he admitted that it was proper, by maintaining the hospital, to show the world how well England took care of her seamen. The Commissioners said that unless their suggestions were adopted it would be better to turn the place into an infirmary for sick seamen. But he was far from wishing to see that done, for at present it stood as a noble monument, and as the ships passed up and down the river the sailors might point to it and say, "There is a place for me to go when I am worn out in the service of my country." In that way men were induced to enter the navy, as the best profession they could adopt. With regard to the salaries of the officers attached to the hospital, the large sum which went in this way crippled the funds of the hospital altogether. There were then the Civil Commissioners, who had been, in his opinion, the cause of much of the mismanagement existing at Greenwich. They were supposed to meet once a week, or oftener if necessary; and, in point of fact, they met every Thursday, and passed a couple of hours or so in transacting the business which devolved upon them. Two of these Commissioners resided in London, and could know nothing of what went on at Greenwich. Then as to the schools, the Commissioners reported that now the female school was abolished the female children of pensioners were left uncared for, and in many instances became additions to the unfortunate creatures who frequented the streets of Greenwich. Such a state of things was most discreditable, and ought to be instantly remedied. Then as to the boys' schools he would confine the lower school to the sons of sailors, who would receive a plain education to fit them for the profession of sailors; but if any boy exhibited especial talent he should be removed to the upper school. Upon the question of expense, the Commissioners showed that if the reforms they proposed were carried out, a smaller number of officers would suffice at a greatly diminished cost. Upon one point he did not agree with the Commissioners. He thought the Governor, although he was not the working head, ought to be allowed a house in which he could befittingly receive Royalty whenever the hospital was honoured by its presence. He quite approved the suggestion that the superintendent with the rank of Rear-Admiral, and two captains, should be appointed only for the space of five years, as that would insure active and efficient officers. It was high time something was done to fill up the ranks of the navy, for at present all our attempts to create a reserve had failed. The new reserve scheme had only produced 1,300 men instead of 30,000 men, and in this great maritime country it was disgraceful to find such a lack of volunteers to man our ships. The disgrace, however, chiefly attached to those who ruled the country, and if the noble Lord would only announce that Greenwich Hospital—the seamen's palace, and the provision of a grateful country for honest services—should be placed upon a proper footing, such a declaration would obviate much of the difficulty now experienced in obtaining men for the navy.

Sir Charles Napier

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, 'it is the opinion of this House that the Report of the Commission on Greenwich Hospital should be carried into effect.'"

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

ADMIRAL WALCOTT, in seconding the Motion said, the Commissioners had in his opinion discharged with great ability and fidelity the duties which they had been appointed to perform. From the evidence which was adduced before them there could be no doubt that Greenwich Hospital had long been neglected, and it was, he thought, to be regretted that our seamen should be compelled to come to that House for that redress and encouragement which ought to have been afforded them by the Board of Admiralty, which might, of its own authority, have carried into effect the essential recommendations of the Commissioners. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Charles Napier) had gone so fully into the details of the bad working of the present system in the Hospital, that he need not enter at any length into the subject. One fact, however, he might be permitted to state, and that was, in those cases in which an allowance of 10d. a day was made to the seamen having families living out of the Hospital for the purpose of maintaining themselves, they preferred almost dying of illness to going into the Infirmary, because when they did so the allowance of 10d. a day was stopped, and their ability to support their wives and children at an end whilst continuing in the Infirmary. He thanked his gallant Friend (Sir Charles Napier) for having brought similar cases of hardship under the notice of the House, particularly in regard to the schools. He wished, before he sat down, to remind him that he had on a previous occasion mentioned an instance in which he said a seaman who had lost a limb had received a pension of a shilling a day only for a year. Now, when his gallant Friend had made that statement he doubted its accuracy, and on subsequent inquiry he ascertained that when men were so disabled, a pension varying from 1s. to 2s. was granted to each in the first instance only for a year, but then at the end of that time the pensioner was re-surveyed with the view of discovering the extent of his disability, and a permanent pension of 1s., 1s. 6d., or 2s. was conferred upon him, the amount depending upon the extent of power which his injury left him to assist himself. He indulged the hope that all sensible modifications in the conduct, discipline, and management of the Hospital for its better efficiency and the comfort of the Pensioners, would at once be carried out by the Board of Admiralty in the event the Motion of his gallant Friend might not be acceded to by the House.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, that he had spoken upon the authority of a certificate given to one of the men.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he was very much obliged to his gallant Friend who had just spoken for having removed the impression which the remarks made by the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Southwark on a former evening were calculated to convey with respect to the conduct of the Admiralty in granting pensions. He had unfortunately spoken before the gallant Admiral on that occasion, as he was generally compelled to do before the Admirals addressed the House, and, therefore, he had not had an opportunity of contradicting his statement, that a poor man who had lost a limb had received a pension only for a year—a statement which he was surprised an officer of his experience in the service did not at once perceive must be incorrect. Now, the fact was, that when a sailor lost a limb a provisional pension was granted him, with a view of affording a given time to ascertain whether the injury done him was or was not so severe as to prevent him from doing anything to earn his own livelihood, by the result of which injury the permanent amount of his pension was regulated. In taking that course the Admiralty were actuated by the most humane feeling, and certainly did not deserve to be stigmatized as having committed an act so unworthy of the department as that to which the hon. and gallant Admiral had referred. Passing, however, from that point, he must express his regret that his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Admiral Walcott) appeared, to some extent, to find fault with the Admiralty for not having taken upon themselves the reform of Greenwich Hospital. If his hon. and gallant Friend, however, supposed they would have time to enter into an investigation of all the details connected with the working of that old and extensive institution, he could hardly have formed an adequate idea of the various other duties which they had to perform. For his own part, he thought his noble Friend the Duke of Somerset, and his colleagues at the Admiralty, had taken a wiser course—being aware that there were many matters connected with the Hospital which required revision—in appointing a Commission to inquire into the subject, composed of able men who could give due time to its full investigation, and arrive at correct conclusions with respect to the requirements of the case. To that Commission he could not allude without offering his thanks, and those of the Government, to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Gateshead (Mr. Hutt) and his colleagues, who had devoted much time and attention to the objects of the inquiry, and the result of whose labours was a most valuable and interesting Report.

He now came to the Motion before the House, to which he could not assent in the shape in which it stood. Indeed, the proposer of that Motion had himself furnished abundant grounds for not agreeing to it, inasmuch, while asking that the Report of the Commissioners should be carried into effect, he had found fault with several of the recommendations which that Report contained. Her Majesty's Government—he would not say had actually decided—but were prepared immediately to give their attention to a plan for effecting improvements in the schools, a subject which formed one of the most important branches of the Report; and if the gallant Admiral would alter the terms of his Motion to those in which it stood on the Paper a few days ago, he should offer no opposition on the part of the Government to its adoption. Action could be taken in reference to the schools without there being a necessity for any Act of Parliament, and the matter was one that was really pressing and important. In very much of what the gallant Admiral had said as to the defects of those schools he entirely concurred, and he hoped that in a short time the plan which was at present before the Board might be carried into effect. It could not be denied that there was one point in which the Commissioners gave a very favourable, perhaps, too favourable a view—namely, as to the revenues of the Hospital. One of their proposals was that the seamen entering Greenwich Hospital should retain their pensions, but that these should be applied in support of that establishment. On the propriety of this system he would not offer any opinion, but it was evident that it amounted, in other words, to a proposal for doubling the yearly subsidy to the Hospital, the probable increase being calculated at something like £20,000. The Commissioners, in recommending that very large expenses should be incurred in increasing the accommodation of the building, were clearly calculating on an excess of income, which he could not think Her Majesty's Government would be justified in contemplating without an express grant on the part of the House of Commons. A point demanding the serious attention of the Board of Admiralty, which would be given to it the moment they had time at their disposal during the recess, was the question of providing accommodation for the wives and children of the pensioners. Various proposals had been made by the Commissioners, one being that part of the hospital should be appropriated towards the residence of married pensioners and their families; another that model lodging-houses should be built; and a third, that certain houses in the town of Greenwich, forming part of the property of the hospital, should be allotted to the wives of pensioners. These were all valuable suggestions; but there was one point in the Report with which he was unable to agree. There seemed to be throughout a feeling on the part of the Commissioners that because the hospital was capable of containing 2,700 persons it was necessary that it should be always filled with that number. It ought to be borne in mind that the institution was one not calculated exclusively for time of peace, but mainly for seasons of war, when, after great battles, enormous numbers of wounded sailors, maimed and crippled in every way, came to Greenwich to find a home. It therefore seemed advisable to him that the hospital should not be filled all at once, but that regard should be had to its purposes of ultimate utility in the event of war. Recommendations with respect to the constitution of the establishment and the redistribution or diminution of the officers were embodied in the Report, but in the opinion of the Admiralty it was very doubtful whether these arrangements could be carried out till an Act of Parliament had been obtained for the purpose. They could scarcely be charged with neglect of duty in not having carried out all the suggestions contained in a Report which had only been two months in their possession, and which it was only due to the officers of the hospital to submit in the first instance for their consideration. As he had already mentioned, the Admiralty had prepared a plan for the improvement of the schools, which he hoped before long would be carried into effect, and during the recess the questions of the model lodging-houses and other matters for the comfort of the pensioners would be taken up; and when Parliament met again the Board would be prepared to state the course they would adopt in reference to this Report.

Lord Clarence Paget

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR said, that he shared the feeling of regret expressed by the Commissioners in their Report that a noble institution like Greenwich Hospital had fallen so far short of the intentions of its founder. He found that in 1805 the charge for salaries and maintenance of the institution amounted to £21,800; it supported 2,460 pensioners, the expenses in connection with them being £69,700. In 1859 the amount of salaries and maintenance had increased to £55,700; only 1,600 pensioners were sheltered by the hospital, the cost of whom had fallen to £44,000. The upper school too was far too predominant in numbers, and he thought that patronage had much to do with the increase. He had the greatest pleasure, therefore, in supporting the Motion of his gallant Friend.

MR. BRISCOE said, that although he had not the honour of belonging to the profession of the navy he wished to say that he thought the thanks of the House were due to the gallant Admiral who had brought this subject under their notice, and also to the Commissioners who had investigated it with so much ability. Their Report ought to be studied by every person who took an interest in the welfare of the navy. As to the answer of the noble Lord, he could not receive it with entire satisfaction. He was glad to hear that the Government intended to consider the subject of the schools and model lodging-houses; but the most important question was the proper application of the funds of the hospital. He was sure that no one who had read the Report of the Commission could come to any other conclusion than that there had been a scandalous misapplication of the funds of Greenwich Hospital, and that great injustice had been done to the seamen of the country. He believed that there was no necessity for an Act of Parliament, and that the Board of Admiralty had full powers to carry out the main recommendations of the Commission, which was all that the gallant Admiral required. He wished that the Government had promised that the funds, amounting to £156,000 a year, should in future be applied faithfully to the benefit of our sailors and of their widows and children. There could be no excuse of want of money, because there was a surplus of £28,000 a year, and the expenditure of that surplus in mining operations was, to say the least of it, very doubtful. There was little difference between the Resolution to which the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty was ready to assent and the Resolution of the gallant Admiral. If pressed to a division, he should give the Motion his cordial support.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he did not think that his hon. Friend (Mr. Briscoe) exactly understood how this question had arisen. His hon. Friend seemed to imagine that this Report had somehow fallen from the skies, and that the Admiralty felt great unwillingness to carry it into effect. But the facts were that the Board of Admiralty themselves deemed the subject fit for inquiry, that they appointed the Commission, that the Commission had only just reported, and that it was the intention of the Admiralty to consider that Report. No one said that every recommendation of the Commission ought to be literally carried into effect, and the only pledge therefore which the Government could properly give was, that they would consider the Report with a view to carrying it into effect in a manner most conducive to the public service. There were two questions of great importance to be considered. One was whether an Act of Parliament was necessary. His hon. Friend said that no Act was necessary; but, with great submission to him, he thought that if the Admiralty had any doubt they would do better to consult the Law Officers of the Crown rather than trust entirely to the opinion of his hon. Friend or of any one not learned in the state of the law upon the subject. The other question was, whether the House should be asked to vote a considerable sum of money in addition to the revenue of the hospital. Those points certainly required consideration. They were not to be decided at once without a moment's thought, and therefore his noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty said, that having appointed the Commission themselves, having just received their Report, and being perfectly ready to consider it with a view to carry its recommendations into effect, the Board of Admiralty ought to have time to do so, and that the House ought not to pledge itself by a vote that every recommendation should be carried into effect without regard to the amount of money required or whether an Act of Parliament was necessary or not. He thought that reply perfectly reasonable, and that to adopt the Resolution was not a practical mode to attain the end which the gallant Admiral had in view.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, the proposition of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty was a very reasonable one, as they had come to the discussion unprepared, and really expected a discussion of a very different nature. As to the schools, the funds might be appropriated in respect to them with much greater advantage to the public service. There were some parts within the hospital which were capable of improvement, and with regard to which it was in the power of the Board of Admiralty to take immediate action. Of this kind was the case of petty officers who were compelled to mess with those who had been common sailors in the same ship. Then there was a mixing up of sailors and marines, and as they never agreed very well when on board ship, it was a matter of no surprise that they did not agree in the hospital. The means of admission might be facilitated, and many minor restrictions might be removed which operated as a hardship on the sailors. It certainly was too much, however, to force the Report on the Government before the Board of Admiralty had a full opportunity of considering its details.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he believed that the hon. and gallant Admiral had done no more than his duty in directing the attention of the House to the important and interesting Report on Greenwich Hospital. He trusted, however, that after the statement of the noble Lord opposite the gallant Admiral would not press his Motion to a division. It had been said that the Motion must not be construed literally; but they could only look to the words of the Motion as it stood, the fair and reasonable interpretation of which was that all the essential and important recommendations of the Commission were forthwith to be carried into effect. He for one was not prepared to go that length. The impression on his mind when at the Admiralty was that the state of the hospital was not satisfactory, and that an inquiry should be instituted. The present Board of Admiralty, adopting the same view, appointed a Commission, and he concurred most cordially in the tribute of admiration that had been paid to the full and able Report which they had prepared. They had now before them a full and able Report, and they had heard from the noble Lord opposite what were the intentions of the Government. Still that Report had not been in the hands of the Government more than two months, and therefore he thought that the noble Lord had met the Motion in a perfectly fair spirit, when he pledged the Board of Admiralty to take the Report into consideration, and at the commencement of next Session to state how far they were prepared to carry its more important recommendations into effect. They could hardly expect the Admiralty to say more than that, nor was he prepared to pledge himself absolutely to support all the recommendations of the Commissioners. He would, however, strongly press on the Admiralty the question of the pensions and the destitute condition of the wives of our seamen. Nothing had created a stronger feeling of indignation in his mind than to find that numbers of the wives of seamen in Greenwich Hospital were actually receiving parish pay, and that applications were frequent to the hospital to discharge the husbands, in order that their wives might be discharged from the unions. There were various other portions of the Report which he thought well deserving their attention, and he sincerely hoped that steps would be taken to place this fine institution on a satisfactory footing.

Lord John Russell

MR. LINDSAY said, he thought there ought to be a material change, which should be carried into effect as soon as possible, but he did not think it right to bind the Government down to details by Resolution. However able the Report was he could not agree in all its provisions, and he would propose that a change should be made in the terms of the Resolution to the effect that the Report should be taken into consideration with a view to carrying the recommendations into effect in such a manner as might be most conducive to the public interest.

MR. SPEAKER said, an Amendment could not be moved to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Admiral.

MR. LINDSAY said, he offered the Amendment as a suggestion to his hon. and gallant Friend with a view of preventing a division.

MR. HENLEY said, that the Report of the Committee disclosed a very extraordinary state of things. No one could peruse it without being satisfied that unless some interference had taken place the whole proceeds of that noble establishment would have been swallowed up by people for whom it was never intended. The misapplication of the funds, the enormous expenditure of the establishment, the unfavourable contrast which it presented to similar institutions on the other side of the water, were all set forth in the Report; and, with these facts before them, the Government could have no difficulty in determining what course to pursue. He thought it should be left entirely to the discretion of the Government to devise a remedy, and that they ought not to be tied down to any particular plan. When the noble Lord expressed his fear that the Report gave too sanguine a view of the revenue of the hospital, he was sorry no hint was given that the pruning knife would be vigorously applied to the establishment, which had a tendency to expand in a very rapid manner. The question was full of interest, and from the Report of the Committee on Greenwich Hospital on the one hand, and the Report of the Manning Commission on the other, it was not difficult to understand why seamen were disinclined to enter the Royal Navy. The present state of things was one which, to say the least of it, left ample room for amendment. He hoped the gallant Admiral would amend his Resolution, or, better still, withdraw it, leaving the whole matter to the responsibility of the Admiralty. If they did act, then would be the time for the House to express their opinion on the Report and the conduct of the Government.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I think what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is really the good sense of the matter. I should hope the House will concur with him; that this discussion may now be considered closed; that you, Sir, may now leave the chair, and that we may go into Committee of Supply. If this were a case in which an important recommendation had been made by a Committee or Commission to which Government had paid no attention; if there were good grounds to suppose that it was not the intention of the Government to pay any attention to it, and the Report had been lying a long time on the table, there might be good reason or opportunity for hon. Members to interfere and press by Resolution on Government the necessity for action. But this is not a case of that kind. There is a Report of a Commission appointed by the present Board of Admiralty; the Report, as stated by my noble Friend, has only been in the hands of the Admiralty a couple of months, if so long, and the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty has declared that it is the intention of the Admiralty at the earliest opportunity to take the Report into consideration, with a view to acting upon it. Well, now, that seems a state of things in which the House need not interpose between the Government and their responsibility, and at the close of the Session dictate to Her Majesty's Government the manner in which they are to act upon the Report. I hope the House will adopt the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman, and, having received from the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty an intimation of their intention to act upon the Report, they will leave the matter to the responsibility of the Government.

LORD LOVAINE said, he quite concurred with what had fallen from the noble Lord. He should be very sorry, in such a case, to tie the hands of the Admiralty; but he would remind the House that whatever they did by way of pensions for those serving in the navy, they must do the same for the sister service.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE recommended the gallant Admiral to withdraw the Motion, or adopt the suggestion of the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty. He could not support it in its present form. The erection of model lodging-houses for the families of the pensioners was a step in the right direction, but he hoped they would be, in the first instance, adopted only to a limited extent, till it was seen whether they gave satisfaction.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE inquired whether the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty would lay on the table the opinions of the officers of Greenwich Hospital with regard to the Report of the Commission. He understood that Sir James Gordon had written a very able statement on the subject, which it was most desirable should be produced.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he had no objection to the production of that Report if it were moved for.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he would now move his Resolution with the suggested alterations.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'in the opinion of this House, the Report of the Commission on Greenwich Hospital should be taken into the immediate consideration of the Government, with the view of carrying into effect the recommendations contained in the Report in such manner as may be most conducive to the public interests.'"

—instead thereof.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the gallant Admiral would not press the Motion to a division after the declarations of the Government.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the gallant Admiral's Motion merely expressed what the Government had already undertaken to do, and he saw no necessity for pressing it.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question,"

Put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.—NAVY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £12,000, Retirement to Officers of the Navy.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he saw no necessity for retirement in the higher lists of naval officers. It was impossible for him to consent to the noble Lord's plan, which was very incomplete and full of inconsistencies. Captains, when they arrived at the head of the list, were to be placed on the list of retired officers at 20s. a day; at present those officers received 25s. a day, and the noble Lord was about to take off 5s. Now, that was not fair, nor was it satisfactory to the service, not a man of which had, to his knowledge, spoken favourably of it. The scheme would place at the disposal of the Admiralty a great many vacancies, and enable it, by a system of favouritism, to fill them up with young and inexperienced officers, to the prejudice of old and deserving officers of many times their length of service. If the period should come again when it was difficult to get an admiral under sixty years of age it might be advisable to establish a fresh retirement; but when there were plenty of qualified officers in their prime who could be appointed to the rank of admiral, he saw no reason for asking the House to vote £15,000 or £20,000 a year to carry out such a useless object. He trusted, therefore, that the noble Lord would not persevere with his scheme.

Sir Charles Napier

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he was opposed to this proposal on three grounds—first, because it would cut off mates' time; secondly, because it did not allow the time an officer served in the Coastguard to count in his favour; and thirdly, because of the manner in which it dealt with commanders on the reserved list. There was no more reason why the time for which an officer served as mate—when he probably discharged very important duties—should be cut off, than there was for cutting off the time of a lieutenant or adjutant in the army from his period of service. A captain in the navy informed him that he had acted as first lieutenant of the commodore's ship on the coast of Africa while he was a mate; that another mate commanded a 20-gun corvette; and that another mate did the duty of first lieutenant of the same corvette. Thus these three officers on the coast of Africa at that period were mates, and yet not one hour of that service was to be allowed to count. Again, why should they strike off the time during which an officer was employed in the Coastguard—perhaps as irksome a service as any that an officer could have to perform, and one in which they were exposed to many casualties? He could name officers who had been maimed and wounded on those stations called the fighting stations, in which there had been skirmishes nearly as formidable as little actions. If they took the actual work a Coastguard officer was called upon to perform, it was fully as hard as that discharged by officers serving either in the Mediterranean or on board the guardships at the home ports. The officers on the reserved list derived their position from an actual bargain with the Admiralty. One of them wrote to tell him that in July, 1856, the Admiralty refused to allow him to command a merchant steamer on the ground that "officers of high rank are not supposed to accept civil engagements." The Admiralty now proposed to reduce this officer to the rank of commander. Some of these officers had served at Trafalgar and the Nile. The whole increase of pay they demanded would be but small, and yet, while the Admiralty were wasting millions of money in the malconstruction of ships and in building useless vessels, they refused these officers the miserable and paltry sum to which they were entitled by the express and deliberate bargain that the Admiralty had entered into with them. He had submitted the order in Council of 1851 to the eminent lawyer, Mr. Lush, Q.C., for his opinion. Mr. Lush stated, in answer, that the question was not one of legal cognizance, but that if the order in Council had been embodied in an Act of Parliament, or was in the nature of a contract that could be enforced in a court of law, he should have no difficulty in advising that the claims of the captains upon the reserved list were well founded. That opinion was in a remarkable manner confirmed by the hon. and learned Attorney General the other day in regard to compensation to persons whose offices were abolished, they themselves being ready still to discharge their duty. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich that this question ought to be referred to a Commission, and investigated as a whole. Great dissatisfaction existed among the officers in the navy. The naval service was in fact an underpaid service, and officers were called upon to contribute to it from their private means. Complaints had now reached a height that was prejudicial to the discipline of the navy, and the question ought to be examined by a Commission, consisting not only of professional men, but also of those who understood what a fair day's wages for a fair day's work really was.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR said, he could not help thinking that the proposal of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty fell far short of the measure that was needed for the settlement of a question that was becoming quite alarming. All classes of naval officers had a more or less reasonable claim for consideration at the hands of the noble Lord. His plan had one condition, that of age, which must be of an arbitrary and in some respects unjust character in regard to the officers affected by it. Take the case, too, of mates. In the Commission on the various services that sat twenty years ago, presided over by the late Duke of Wellington, it was agreed that mates in the navy were as fully entitled to be regarded as officers as were ensigns in the army. It was very hard that officers who had commanded gunboats in the French war as mates and acting lieutenants were not allowed to count their service as mates. He knew one instance where an officer commanded a gunboat as mate from 1809 until 1814, and he justly complained that the whole of this time was taken no notice of in his favour. A lieutenant must serve nine years as mate to entitle him to a certain amount of half-pay; and there was one case where a gentleman had served within a few weeks of that time, but he had been for a long time a mate. Again, as to captains' half-pay, a good deal of hardship would be imposed. Half-pay was in many cases, not a retaining fee, but a final pension, and it deserved consideration whether officers who had not served much should be entitled to rise in the amount of their half-pay. If the principle of retirement on account of age was to be introduced, it ought to be applied with impartiality to all ranks. He could not support the scheme before the Committee, and he should be glad to see a Commission or a Committee appointed to consider the whole subject of pay, pensions, and retirements.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I am very much disappointed at the course which the Board of Admiralty has taken with regard to this retirement plan. The question has been before the House upon a previous occasion, and I never heard any question discussed in a fairer spirit, and with less approach to anything like party feeling on one side of the House or the other, the only object in view being the good of the naval service. But from neither side of the House did I hear a single speech in favour of the Government scheme. After that discussion I received innumerable letters from officers of all ranks, from flag officers down to lieutenants of long standing, thanking me for my opposition to the measure, and deprecating it as unworthy of the Admiralty and most unacceptable to the service, and I had hoped that, considering the opposition to the plan which was manifested in this House, the Government would not have persevered with it. At the head of this retirement scheme the noble Lord has placed these remarks:—

“There are three requisites for an efficient navy,—first, that the principal ranks should be supplied with a sufficient number of officers in the prime of life; secondly, that officers who are desirous and fit to serve should find employment; and, thirdly, that encouragement should be offered either by promotion or otherwise, to induce officers to serve willingly as long as they are efficient.”

I defy my noble Friend to prove that this scheme will fulfil any one of these conditions. The first is the most important; but what will this scheme do to effect that object? I know that my noble Friend will tell me that he has adopted the principle of compulsory retirement by age to a certain point, and that, therefore, so far as that goes he has followed the plan which I ventured to propose. I do not think that my noble Friend is justified in using that argument, because I entirely agree with what has just fallen from my hon. and gallant Friend, that to justify the application to the navy of the principle of compulsory retirement, which is a strong one to adopt, it ought to be applied fairly throughout the service. I contend that if you are to adopt the principle of retirement by age you must, in order to make it fair and acceptable, combine it with some other plan, which will give to officers the encouragement and the benefit of a regular flow of promotion. This plan does not do that. You tell the junior ranks of officers that at a certain age they are to be compelled to retire, but you admit that you are afraid to apply this principle to the senior ranks. The result will be that there will be no flow of promotion. The captains and flag officers will not get out of the way, and the retirement by age will be enforced upon the junior ranks without any compensation. Another objection to the plan has been adverted to already—namely, that you do not allow officers in counting their service to reckon the time served as mate. I think that that is a great injustice. I do entreat the Admiralty, if they are disposed to deal with this subject at all, to do so upon wide and comprehensive principles, and upon a plan which shall not only be beneficial but acceptable to the naval service. The service repudiate this plan; they dislike it. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET dissented.] My noble Friend thinks not. Perhaps he can give me authorities for that opinion. I can only say that I have received a great many letters from officers of rank, saying that the plan is not acceptable to them, that, on the contrary, they dislike and repudiate it. The case is one of extreme hardship. I cannot forget what Admiral Hope, an admirable man as well as an excellent officer, told me last year—perhaps as it was a private conversation I ought not to mention it, but I state it to his honour—that when visiting the north of England on the Harbour of Refuge Commission, he met at Newcastle one officer who had served with him when they were midshipmen together, but who was still a lieutenant in the navy. Perhaps such cases must happen in the service, but they are severely felt, and we ought to do all we can to make them less frequent. Again,

Sir John Pakington

I have had letters from officers who served as mates doing the duty, but not having the rank of lieutenants. It is very hard that such men should not be allowed to count the time during which they so served as mates. These are the things which make the proposed plan so unacceptable to the navy, and I deeply regret that the present Board of Admiralty, in their desire to force an objectionable system upon the service, should refuse a proposal which I intend to bring forward in good faith, and with no party feeling,—namely, that a well constituted Commission should be appointed to inquire into the whole subject. On Tuesday evening next I shall make that Motion, and I implore the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who must wish to do what is right by the navy, before that day comes, to consider whether we ought not to follow in the present case an example which has more than once been offered by the army, and refer to a well-constituted Commission the consideration of these difficult and complicated questions. Meanwhile I regret the course which the Government are taking. I think they are making a great mistake. Their plan is not one that ought to be adopted. I know it to be unpalatable and unacceptable to the navy, and if the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has taken the lead in opposition to this Vote asks the Committee to divide I shall certainly deem it my duty to vote with him.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET : — To a naval officer in the position which I have the honour to hold, there cannot, I think, be a more painful duty than that of bringing forward a scheme for the benefit of his profession. Nothing is more easy than to state plausible objections to any plan that may be proposed for bettering the situation of officers in the Navy. It is quite impossible to deal with a great service, including a variety of conflicting interests, so as to prevent the occurrence of cases of hardship. I suppose that is the reason why the right hon. Baronet opposite, who was at the head of the Admiralty a year and a half, never brought before us any scheme for improving the position of the officers of the navy. He saw a thousand difficulties in his way; and found that under any plan he might adopt cases of hardship must occur. Nevertheless, considering how poignantly he feels the present lamentable state of the navy, and what he has told us respecting the general discontent which prevails in the service, I am surprised that he remained so long at the head of the Admiralty without bringing some comprehensive scheme for all ranks before us. The plan which he left behind him at the Admiralty, which he did not submit to Parliament, but which has, at his desire, been laid on the table, would have been at once more expensive and, I believe, less advantageous to the navy than the one which I have laid before the House. We propose to limit our exertions to those ranks in which there is no flow of promotion. During the past year promotion has been almost at a standstill with respect both to commanders and to lieutenants, and we propose to apply relief where the shoe really pinches. I admit that in the event of war, when you require a large number afloat, that admirals above a certain age should retire for the benefit of the service; but that is not necessary at the present moment, and any scheme for the compulsory retirement of old admirals, such as that recommended by the right hon. Baronet opposite, would only break the hearts of distinguished officers who served us in all our great wars. Men like Lord Dundonald would certainly object very strongly to be placed upon a retired list; they would feel it to be a stigma upon them, and they would not be far wrong. But the right hon. Baronet does not propose to create a flow of promotion; he simply wants to reduce the flag list by striking off a number of old admirals. I admit that the flag list is too large; but nature will clear it, and there is no necessity for wounding the feelings of distinguished officers on the brink of the grave. Our scheme, therefore, does not touch the flag officers. The other objections which have been stated to our scheme are—first, that reserved captains are not to be put in the same position as captains on the active list; secondly, that mates' time is not to be counted; and thirdly, that Coastguard time is not to be reckoned as of the same value as sea time. I shall deal with the last objection first. Surely nobody will say that the duties, perils, and responsibilities of a Coastguard officer, especially in time of war, are to be compared for a moment with those of a sea-going officer. To give a Coastguard officer the same claim as a sea-going officer, would be to put the same value upon service performed at home, and service performed in foreign and unhealthy climates. It would interfere to a serious extent with the promotion of sea-going officers, and would certainly not tend to the good of the navy. With respect to mates' time, it is all very well to say that we should allow mates' time to be counted; but how would such a system operate in practice? How would this affect the navy of the present day? I am quite aware that in old times mates were left in that position for many years; but we are not legislating for the past but for the future. The officers of the present day have served scarcely above two years as mates; so that by increasing the period of service, including mates' time, to entitle them to increased pay, which you must do if mates' time is to be held to be of the same value as lieutenants' time, you would by so much damage their position. That was what the Admiralty, dealing for the present and the future, could not, with all respect for the old officers, propose to do; and now with respect to the officers on the reserved list. I am perfectly willing to admit that the case pointed out by my gallant Friend is a hard case; but it must not be supposed that the Admiralty are cutting down any person's pay, for not a single officer will be put in a worse position than before. All that we say is, that if an officer arrives at sixty years of age, and has not served his country above a certain number of years, that officer should retire on his present pay; but that if he has served above a certain number of years, he should then have increased pay; so that all who have faithfully served their country would be benefited by the scheme. There is this distinction between the present scheme and that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman—that this is principally for the benefit of the junior ranks of the navy, those who have no friends and no influence. I cannot admit that his has sufficiently kept them in view. There was one great oversight in the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman left at the Admiralty on quitting office, and that had reference to the half-pay of lieutenants on the active service list. This is one of the most expensive parts of our scheme. We propose with regard to the lieutenants on the active list—the young men of the present day—that, according to their service afloat, their half-pay should increase from 4s. to 8s. 6d. a day. These are the principal features of the scheme I have had the honour to submit to the House—the full details of which are on the table. I must deny the existence of the general discontent that has been spoken of, for I have received a great number of letters approving the scheme. These letters, however, state that the scheme does not go far enough; and I am willing to admit that; but if the Chancellor of the Exchequer can be persuaded to give us double the sum I will produce a better scheme. The Government, however, must deal with the question not only in reference to the officers of the navy, but in comparison with the officers in the army. I have always been told that my gallant brethren in the navy are the worst enemies of the service in this respect—that when any measure is brought forward for the benefit of the service, they throw difficulties in its way by bringing forward individual cases of hardship. I do trust that any such remarks may not mar the success of this scheme. I do not say that hereafter it may not be enlarged upon; but I maintain that it is in the right direction, and a very great boon to the junior branches of the service, and I, therefore, earnestly hope that the House will consent to the Estimate which is under discussion.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON explained, that in what he said just now he did not refer to his own scheme, but whenever the proper time arrived he should be prepared to defend it. What he had said was, that the scheme of the present Admiralty was bad and defective, and the noble Lord threw the responsibility on the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who would not, the noble Lord said, consent to the expense of a good scheme. But it was the duty of the Admiralty to tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer that they would not be induced by him to propose a bad scheme. The noble Lord then taunted him by observing that while at the Admiralty he had not proposed to deal with these questions, but it should be remembered that during the greater part of that time he devoted his attention to supply those deficiencies which he found existing in the number of ships. Nevertheless, the late Board did pay attention to this subject and produced the scheme which had been laid on the table, and which, he believed, was acceptable to the navy. It had been his intention to deal with every one of the questions alluded to by the noble Lord. He dealt with the medical officers, and was going on to deal with other ranks in the service; and why was it that that intention was not carried into effect? The noble Lord forgot the pressing demand which was said to exist last year on the part of the country for a good Reform Bill, and for the sake of which the late Administration were turned out of office before he had been able to deal with that and a great many other questions which he was prepared to entertain.

Lord Clarence Paget

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken in thinking he had stated that the Chancellor of the Exchequer refused to allow a larger sum, and therefore a better scheme could not be produced. What he had said was, that the Government were bound to consider the question of pounds shillings and pence, and that no doubt, with a larger sum of money, a very comprehensive scheme might be produced.

SIR FRANCIS BARING observed, that though it was said that nobody approved the noble Lord's scheme, there was, he believed, a great deal to be approved in it. He thought the increase of the half-pay according to the sea service of the officers a very good arrangement. The scheme applied a remedy where the shoe pinched. The case was so difficult a one that it was almost impossible to suggest a plan which should work equally in war or peace, still more in a time of transition from war to peace. He was not very fond of the limit of age, but in this instance, as he understood it, the limit was not one of age only, but of age combined with service. With regard to captains, the object of removing all captains above 60 from the active list was to reduce them to 350, in order that the course of promotion might be clear. But they were at that number already, and this being all that was wanted, he thought they might leave the list alone until some pressing inconvenience arose. With regard to the Coastguard it ought not to be made, as it were, a degraded service. The principle ought to be, that every branch of the service should be treated as if it were a part of the whole, and that all classes of employés should be dealt with alike. Generally speaking, however, he thought the scheme a good one, though it was not difficult to pick holes in it.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, the noble Lord had given no sufficient reason why the mate's time should not count in the same way as a commander was allowed to count his lieutenant's time.

MR. WARRE asked, why the memorial of the captains on the reserved list had not received the assent of the Admiralty?

MR. CONINGHAM said, he thought that true economy was to do justice to the service; and he was of opinion that, considering the onerous duties which devolved upon the Coast-guard officers, scant justice was done to them in the new arrangement.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the reserved captains had never served in that rank, but had been promoted at once from commander to captain. They were allowed to claim their time equally with other captains.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE observed that in the Civil Service every day of a man's service counted, and he could not see why the same rule should not prevail in the naval service.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £33,000, Naval Operations in China.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER complained that upon the last Vote he and others had cried "No," but nevertheless the Chairman had passed on to the next item.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had put the Question twice, and upon the second occasion no cry of "No" was raised, and therefore he declared the Vote agreed to.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE moved that the Chairman report Progress.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS suggested to the hon. Gentleman that he might make any remarks he might wish to address to the House on the bringing up of the Report.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE complained that the sum proposed to be voted was not an adequate reward for the services performed, for it would amount to only about £2 to each man, though they had been engaged two years in this service. He understood that a distinct understanding would be come to with the troops about to be engaged in the coming operations in China. He hoped the navy would be put on an equal footing with the army in any such arrangement.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he had stated to the House the other night that the army on service in China received certain advantages over the army serving in other parts of the world. The troops serving in China had a better allowance of provisions, and they also had less "stoppages" than their colleagues elsewhere. He believed the advantages enjoyed by men so engaged were equivalent to a money value of 2d. per day, and he proposed to give the seamen and Marines on that service a similar sum for one year, irrespective of the Canton booty.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to give notice that in consequence of an unfair advantage having, as he considered, been taken when the last Vote was put, he should divide the House on the bringing up of the Report.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he did not think that there was the least intention of unfairness on the part of the right hon. Gentleman in the chair, but the hon. and gallant Admiral, and several other Members, had distinctly said "No," when the question was put a first time, however it might have been when the question was put a second time. That raised the point why the Question should be put a second time—a matter which should be put beyond the possibility of dispute. He thought that when the Question was put a second time it ought to have been put more distinctly.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think in all such matters it is desirable the rules of the House should be strictly adhered to. It is not sufficient for hon. Gentlemen to cry "No" to call for a division; but, unless those who differ from the Speaker's or the Chairman's decision declare that the "Ayes" or the "Noes" have it, a division is not called for. Although this may not be a distinction that would strike everybody it is a distinction established by the rules of the House, and ought to be observed. My hon. and gallant Friend, I recollect perfectly, did not say, "The Noes have it," and it is not enough to say "No," to challenge a division.

THE CHAIRMAN: The practice, as far as my experience goes, is frequent. The Speaker constantly puts the Question twice and even thrice. If he has any doubt as to the sense of the House, he puts the Question a second time, and if he is still doubtful as to whether it is the desire of that House to take a division, he puts the Question a third time; and if it does not receive a distinct challenge from any one Gentleman, the practice is to declare that "the Ayes" or the "Noes" have it. Following that example, as is my duty, I consider that I have consulted the pleasure of the Committee by putting the Question a second time; because the only hon. Member who challenged, when I put the Question the first time, was the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER: When the Report is brought up I shall take very good care to comply with the practice of the House.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

LONDON CORPORATION BILL.
COMMITTEE.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I beg to move that the Order for the Adjourned Debate on this Bill be discharged.

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate on Committee [24th April] read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter
after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, July 20, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland); Coast of Africa, &c., Act Amendment; Offences within Her Majesty's Possessions Abroad.

2^a Mines Regulation and Inspection; Tramways (Ireland); Isle of Man Harbours; Dominica Hurricane Loan; Admiralty Court Jurisdiction.

3^a Local Taxation Returns; Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment.

TITHE COMMUTATION BILL.
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

THE EARL OF DERBY objected to the provision in the measure which gave power to the Commissioners to compel the redemption where the rent-charge did not exceed £15, although neither the person paying nor the person receiving sought to have the charge redeemed. He could not conceive on what ground the clause had been introduced.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that the provision applied only to a few parishes, where the cost of making an apportionment would exceed the cost of redemption, and that the persons whom it affected had requested the Tithe Commissioners to insert it. He reminded their Lordships that the Bill had been fully considered by a Select Committee.

THE EARL OF DERBY still objected to the Commissioners constituting themselves judges as to whether redemption should take place, notwithstanding that the payor might desire to continue paying and the payee to continue receiving.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next.

MINES REGULATION AND INSPECTION
BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, that the professed object of the Bill was to give greater security to persons employed in mining, but it went further by appointing certain persons to stand, in reference to young persons employed in mines, in loco parentis. Under the Factory Act, if the parents did not take sufficient charge of their offspring, the State stepped in and assumed the performance of their duties. As the law now stood very young children were not allowed to work in mines; but boys between ten years of age and twelve were allowed to work in them, provided they could show a certificate of having received a certain amount of education. He thought it might be desirable to obtain the opinion of the House how far it might be necessary to adopt the second clause of the Bill, or whether it might not be desirable to omit it altogether. There was no objection on the part of persons interested in mines to the general scope of the Bill, but the point to be considered was whether it was right to impose certain restrictions in the case of certain trades which were not common to other trades. He did not intend to oppose that stage of the Bill, but he would propose some Amendments when it was in Committee.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) BILL.
SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE moved that the Bill be now read the second time. The measure had received the support of men of all parties in Ireland. Last year a measure on the same subject passed the other House without opposition, and stood for a second reading in their Lordships' House on the 14th of April. Parliament, however, having been prorogued a few days afterwards, the Bill necessarily dropped. It had been objected to the Bill that these tramways would be so good and so cheap that they would compete with the established railways; but there was a clause in the Bill which amply provided against any such consequence. There were, too, all kinds of securities in the Bill against the invasion of the rights of property—much ampler securities, in fact, than at present existed in the case of common roads. A great deal of pains had been taken by the Select Committee of the other House with this Bill, and it had passed through the House without any opposition. Under this Bill tramways could be made at a less expense than if a special Act were necessary, and they would be extremely convenient in the crowded parts and suburbs of Dublin, if conducted upon the system which had been so successful in America. He was informed upon good authority that in that country 34,000,000 persons had been carried with only twelve cases of bodily injury, and he defied comparison in safety between tramways and any other kind of conveyance. Upon every ground he trusted their Lordships would not refuse to give the Bill a second reading.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, that the measure would prove very advantageous to Ireland; but he thought some of its provisions would require careful consideration in Committee, and it might appear at first to some noble Lords that the Bill contained extraordinary and surprising powers; but they should recollect that in Ireland roads could be made without the sanction of Parliament for the purpose, while in England the consent of Parliament would be necessary in the first instance. He should be most happy to give his support to the Bill being read a second time.

LORD REDESDALE said, he concurred in the advantages of tramways under certain circumstances, and he did not see why, if land was allowed to be taken for railways, it should not be allowed to be taken for tramways. But he must warn their Lordships that this Bill proposed to introduce a new principle into their private legislation. It proposed, by a general Act, to confer the power of taking land to the decision of an inferior tribunal. Now, if this were done, there was no reason why tramways should not have the same privileges as railways, and he put it to their Lordships whether they were prepared to allow such undertakings to be carried out without the specific sanction, in every case, of a Parliamentary Committee. But he believed in point of fact the real object of the Bill was to promote the establishment of tramways, to be ultimately converted into railways. If any system for taking land by a more economical method could be introduced it ought not to be legislated for Ireland only, but for the entire country. If this system were adopted it would be necessary to have a Railway Board.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: There would be the Board of Works.

LORD REDESDALE: These tramways would be worked by animal power, and would cross inconveniently roads on a level, and inferior lines might be selected and made that it would hereafter be difficult to convert into railways, or make locomotive power applicable. Unless their Lordships were prepared to alter this Tramways Bill into a Railway Bill, and introduce an alteration into the whole principle of private legislation as regarded Ireland, he thought they should not sanction this Bill.

THE EARL OF LUCAN said, he had the strongest possible objection to the Bill. If the Bill was good for Ireland, it was equally so for England and Scotland; but if it was returned to the House of Commons with that addition, it would not receive a moment's consideration from the House. The railway interest would not tolerate it. The Bill was for the establishment of railways under the disguise of tramways. The horse tramways which would be constructed under the Bill if it passed, would, after a time, be converted into locomotive railways to compete with those already in existence. Would they think of substituting the grand jury in Ireland for the Legislature in these matters? According to the Bill the company was not to be formed until it had gone before the grand jury and a deposit was paid. The grand juries were to act under the advice of the county surveyor; and the result would be that they would become the agents of the tramway company. In short, it would be a job that would run through the whole country. The Bill was an unjust Bill, a tyrannical Bill, and inconsistent with right and justice. He should move its rejection, and propose that it be read on that day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now,") and insert ("this Day Six Months").

LORD LIFFORD said, there was no fear that inferior lines of tramway would run across the country, because as much care was taken to select good lines as in the case of railways. The lines must be approved by the Irish Board of Works, and afterwards by the Lord Lieutenant, and then ultimately they must come before Parliament for approval, the only difference being that the Lord Lieutenant would take charge of each Bill, and that the promoters would be saved the expense of a private Bill. He trusted that their Lordships would read the Bill a second time.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he came down with the intention of opposing this Bill, believing that there was an ultimate design of turning these tramways into railways. After hearing the speeches of the noble Lords who advocated the Bill, he had, however, altered his opinion, and should support the second reading.

After a few words from the Marquess of CLANRICARDE,

THE EARL OF LUCAN withdrew his Amendment, but intimated that he should renew it if the Bill were passed in anything like its present shape by the Select Committee.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn. Then the original Motion agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee; and on the Monday following the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

M. Bath	L. Ponsonby
E. Derby	L. Redesdale
E. Mayo	L. Mont Eagle (M. Sligo)
E. Lucan	L. Silchester (E. Longford)
E. Ducie	L. Somerhill (M. Clanricarde)
V. Leinster	L. Worthingham
V. De Vesoi	L. Stanley of Alderley
V. Lifford	L. Monteagle of Brandon
V. Hutchinson (E. Donoughmor)
V. Eversley
L. Boyle

House adjourned at half-past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, July 20, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Ionian Islands (Marriages); Corrupt Practices Prevention Act (1854) Continuance; Metropolitan Police Force (Dockyards); Leases Confirmation (Ireland).

2^o Maynooth College; Spirit Duties; Census (Scotland); Excise Duties; Anchors and Chain Cables.

3^o Prisons (Scotland); Herring Fisheries (Scotland); Railways Act (Ireland) (1851); Amendment; Highways (South Wales).

Lord Lifford

SAVINGS BANKS AND FRIENDLY SOCIETIES INVESTMENTS BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.
House in Committee.

(In the Committee),

Clause 1 (Stock to be Cancelled).

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, it was an inevitable consequence of the manner in which this Bill had been conducted—a long period having always elapsed between its appearances before the House—that the general principle of the measure was discussed over and over again, and that the House was doomed to hear, time after time, a repetition of the same arguments in regard to it. That was the more inevitable when the first clause had to be discussed, for, in point of fact, the first clause involved the whole principle of the Bill. The measure would cancel not less than £30,000,000 of stock, and the House was naturally anxious to know what security was to be offered as a substitute for that large amount of stock, and that question opened up the subject of the second clause, the creation of the State deposit, No. 1. They had yet to know the agency by which that creation was to be conducted, and the persons to be responsible. He objected to the transference of the securities from one form to another. The whole amount was at present held by the Government as a security to the local banks upon identically the same footing with the same amount of stock held by the Government in the name of any single person. That was the greatest security which it was in the power of Parliament to offer. He was, therefore, jealous of any alteration in that kind of security. It was proposed by the Bill to cancel an amount of stock equal in round figures to £29,000,000, in addition to the further sum of £2,000,000, the difference between the amount of securities held by the Government and the liabilities to the savings banks. All that sum was to be transferred to a book which was to be kept in the National Debt Office, and was no longer to be liable to the fluctuations in the Funds; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to insert in that book every year a sum which was to represent the deficiency between the interest receivable and the interest payable to the savings banks. Now the savings banks were entitled at any time to receive their money, and that might entail a great loss on the State, because the public might be called upon to pay at a time when the stock would be considerably below par. He thought it would be a much better plan, as recommended by the Commission which had sat upon the subject, to lay a statement of the deficiency annually before Parliament, and let provision be made for it as for the other requirements of the year. He did not think sufficient cause had been made out to justify the new mode of management. It was not merely a savings banks question, it was a question of public policy. That which was now proposed with respect to savings banks a future Chancellor of the Exchequer might propose with regard to some other fund. Therefore, opposing as he did the whole Bill, he should move that the first clause be omitted, in order to give effect to the objection which he had to the Bill.

MR. BRISCOE said, the question at issue between the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and those who opposed the Bill was this:—The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government considered that they should be bankers for the large sums of money deposited in the savings banks, whereas those who opposed the Bill thought that the moneys of the savings banks should be dealt with by a body of trustees, separate and distinct from the Government, and that no one should have power to use these moneys except to pay the depositors. That was the view he took of the question. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have no power to make use of this money. If he required money at any time it should be obtained in a constitutional manner, and not taken from a fund consigned for safety and security to the Government of the country. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer would act wisely in withdrawing the Bill.

MR. HUBBARD said, he thought it would be impracticable to keep such a separate account of the savings-banks' funds as had been recommended. The real security of the savings-banks' depositors was the credit of the country, and if the Bill was intended to add anything to that security he thought it wholly unnecessary; but the Bill went beyond that, and aimed at simplifying the management of these funds in the hands of the Government. Objections had been taken to the mode in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer made use of the savings-banks' funds to carry out financial schemes of the Government. He heartily joined in deprecating any such use of these funds. The savings-banks' money was in the hands of the Government for security, but not as a means of financial intrigue. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had been able, by means of the large sum in his power, to carry out unseen operations on the Stock Exchange, which enabled him to prepare the way for some great scheme of the Government; but that was a course of proceeding most unfair and unjustifiable, and the sooner it was exploded the better. In this respect, however, he regarded the Bill as an immense improvement, because it provided the means of dealing with this large sum as a book-debt that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not touch. The money was by the Bill taken out of the possibility of jobbery. Particular clauses of the Bill might be open to objection, but he wished to express his general approval of the measure. There had been a good many petitions, apparently from the same mint, presented against the Bill; but, with the exception of some fears that had been expressed as to a reduction of interest—for which he admitted there were some grounds—there was nothing in the Bill which justified the petitions that had been levelled against it.

MR. HENLEY said, he must protest against a Bill affecting such large interests being brought forward at a period of the Session when it was impossible for it to receive the discussion which its importance demanded, and in a House so thin as invariably was the case at morning sittings. He wanted to know who called for the Bill, and he would ask where were the petitions of those who were its supporters? The tendency of the Bill was greatly to shake the confidence of the depositors in savings banks. It had been said that the petitions presented against the Bill were nearly similar in terms, but the reason of that was obvious, because the managers of savings banks knew very well the imminent danger in which they would be placed by the passing of the Bill of the interest to the depositors being reduced. He believed the savings banks had wisely taken alarm; he believed that it was seriously intended to reduce their interest, and that this Bill was laying the foundation of that measure, for people were apt to judge more from deeds than from words. The Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke as if the savings-banks' money would be taken out of his hands; but by the Bill he would keep in his hands ample funds for all that any Chancellor of the Exchequer might want to do in the way of jobbery. He repeated that the real object of the Bill was to reduce the interest to savings-banks' depositors, and he could scarcely see any other.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought he had reason to complain of the language of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley), language which had gone to the extreme verge of Parliamentary licence. He was not warranted in saying that the manifest object of the Bill was to enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to do that which he knew the Chancellor of the Exchequer had absolutely disclaimed. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had distinctly stated that there was no intention to reduce the interest on savings banks' deposits, and the right hon. Gentleman abused the liberty of speech which was enjoyed in that House when he made allegations applicable not to matters of policy or opinion, but to personal intentions. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman might not pay much attention to his assertions on this point, but he surely must see the force of the argument, that the best answer to the allegation about reducing the rate of interest was that the effect of the Bill as it stood was to enlarge the income of the fund, and to make provision for its further enlargement hereafter; and he need hardly add that a Bill that enlarged the income of the fund could not be made an excuse for diminishing the interest. One material item of that enlargement of income proposed by the Bill was to invest a sum—say four or five millions—in securities bearing a larger rate of interest than the present investments, and which in the course of a year or two might increase the income by £40,000 or £50,000. He had a word or two to say with regard to the objections taken out of doors to the Bill. There were, no doubt, certain officers of savings banks who had an interest in maintaining the power they now had of cutting and carving on the sum that formed the difference between the £3 5s. per cent paid by the public, and the sum paid to depositors. These officers endeavoured to maintain their own interests by sending in petitions against the Bill, which, as they thought, tended to diminish the funds available for defraying the expenses of savings banks, and raising all those beautiful buildings that were to be seen in so many of the towns of this country—buildings used for two or three hours a week for savings-bank purposes, and which formed very agreeable residences for those officers. They very naturally opposed the Bill, but he did not believe there was the slightest indication of the depositors being alarmed at any of its provisions. The state of the case as regarded the security of the depositors was this:—The moral obligation of the country was full and absolute to return to the trustees of savings banks both principal and interest, and that moral obligation was recorded in an Act of Parliament; but there was no legal machinery by which effect could be given to the legal obligation. It was merely a moral obligation legally recorded. Now, if it could be supposed, as an extreme case, that all the banks in the country were at once to demand from the Government the repayment of the whole sum that was due to them, it would not be in the power of the Government to make that repayment. He would positively state that the Commissioners of the National Debt had at present no power to do anything except to realize their assets, and hand over those insufficient assets in part satisfaction of the claim. But let the Bill before the Committee be passed, and so long as there was a shilling left available in the Consolidated Fund, the whole of the funds of the country would be answerable to satisfy the whole of these obligations. Indeed, he confessed that it had been an error not to have created this full and perfect legal title at an earlier period. There had no doubt been practical safety between the savings banks and the Government, but the full legal machinery to enforce that obligation had not existed, and it was very desirable to supply that want, so that the trustees of savings banks, on behalf of their depositors, might be in as good a position as any man who drew a dividend from his money in the funds four times in the year. It was quite true that a book debt, as this had been called, was not a convertible security, but he provided means of substituting marketable securities for that book debt in the extreme and remote case of the demand for the means of realizing the amount exceeding the amount of stock which was retained. In any case there would ultimately be a resort to the Consolidated Fund. Now it was admitted that there was a large existing deficiency between the assets and liabilities of the National Debt Commissioners on the savings bank account. He proposed to deal with that deficiency, amounting to £3,500,000, first by rectifying the capital account, and then by providing machinery which would gradually restore the income of the fund to an equality with the annual charges upon it. He did not think he should have been justified in throwing upon the country, at that time, the burthen of at once making good that deficiency, so he proposed to add it to the amount of the obligations already acknowledged; and at the same time, whilst extinguishing an amount of nominal stock held on that account, and thus making a saving of £9,000 or £10,000 a year, he would adopt a natural and simple system instead of the present artificial one, and would make it openly appear on the account that the Government held so much money repayable at call. It would be quite impracticable to adopt the plan which had been suggested, of taking each particular deposit as a separate investment, and it would be no favour to the depositors to offer to take their money and invest it in the Funds, since they could do that for themselves. The Bill did involve a considerable diminution of the powers of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, though it was not, as had been truly observed, by the mere creation of £31,000,000 of deposit account that his powers were materially diminished. Two-thirds, however, of the amount, which might be invested in other securities than those now permitted by law, would practically be so much removed from the control of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would not be in his power to make use of those stocks for financial purposes, in the manner in which, probably, upon many great occasions, the existing securities had been employed. The way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been accustomed to manage his great operations was this. He sold stock, and with the proceeds he purchased Exchequer bills, and then again he had funded his Exchequer bills, all which he had been enabled to do without bringing his operations under the review of Parliament. Now, by the Bill the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be deprived to some extent of the opportunity of practising that operation of selling stock and converting it into Exchequer bills at his convenience. It must thenceforth be an operation necessarily limited and temporary in its nature; and it must, if this Bill became the law, always be brought under the notice of Parliament before it took effect. But if the House did not choose to pass this Bill, although the public would be somewhat poorer, and the legal title of the savings-bank trustees to their funds held by Government would remain imperfect, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would continue to enjoy what was supposed to be the luxury of being able to deal with a large sum of money—a power which he (Mr. Gladstone) was now endeavouring to reduce. He therefore hoped the Committee would at once agree to this first clause of the Bill.

Mr. Henley

MR. HENLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be annoyed at something he had said as to his intention. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would make allowance for him, considering the great length of time that had elapsed since the discussion took place on the Bill. In what he said he had no intention to go further than this, that people judged only by what they saw in the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was perfectly satisfied.

MR. HANKEY said, he thought there must be a re-adjustment of the savings-bank account in some way or other, but he objected to the mode in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to do it. Though he did not believe that any individual Chancellor of the Exchequer he had known would abuse the power of dealing with the funds, he was distinctly in favour of their being placed under the management of responsible and permanent trustees.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he should support the clause, which he thought materially improved the security given to the depositors. Some Gentlemen were in favour of a separate body of trustees to manage the fund, but the adoption of that proposal would by no means be favourable to the security of the depositors.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that before they went to a division he wished to remind the Committee that it was proposed by this clause to cancel securities to the extent of £28,962,742. That was exercising more than a banking power, and it was quite clear that it was a financial arrangement of a very gigantic and novel character. He objected to the proposal to entrust the management of the funds to an ex-officio Commission that would not act, thereby really leaving the management in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day. Then came the question whether they ought to confide the power of changing the securities to any Chancellor of the Exchequer. He trusted the Committee would not consent to the clause, not alone because the proposition was objectionable, but also because they could not at that period of the year give the measure the consideration to which it was entitled.

COLONEL SYKES opposed the clause, and expressed his conviction that the provisions of the Bill generally would not be satisfactory to the country.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 78 ; Noes 116 : Majority 38.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have only to move, Sir, that you leave the chair, as the loss of the first clause destroys the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed. [No Report].

RIFLED MUSKETS.—QUESTION.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, what number of Rifled Muskets have been manufactured at the Government Establishment at Enfield during the twelve months ending the 30th of June last, and at what rate the manufacture is now proceeding ; and what number of Rifled Muskets have been received from Contractors during the same period, and what number the Government are still liable to receive under Contract?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Sir, the number of rifles made at Enfield during the year ending the 30th of June was 90,707, which is at the weekly average of 1,744. But they are now making at a higher weekly average—namely, 1,900, rising to 2,000 as the new machinery erected comes into operation. We have received 30,416 rifled muskets from contractors, and the Government are still liable to receive under contract 99,626.

DISTRICT PROBATE REGISTRARS.

QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is intended by the Government that the payment of District Registrars appointed under the Probate Act (20 & 21 Vict., c. 77) by fees shall be continued ; or whether the Government will take into consideration the extent of services performed, and order payment for the same (under the 111th Section of the said Act) by salaries, and carry the fees to the Consolidated Fund account, and make a reduction of fees payable by the public?

Sir Henry Willoughby

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Government have already acted on the principle to which the question of my hon. Friend points. Some time ago a Minute of the Treasury placed these Officers upon salaries, under powers given to the Government by Act of Parliament, and requiring that after receiving their salaries they should account for the balance of fees to the public. But some of the Officers affected by that order made objection and appealed against it, which appeal is still under consideration. The principle, however, which my hon. Friend indicates has been adopted.

BONDING PORTS.—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would now beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if his attention has been called to the loss sustained by the Revenue in consequence of certain small Ports and Creeks where Goods for Bonding are not imported at all, and in other places to insignificant amounts, and the Duties collected are disproportionate to, and in some cases below, the cost; and whether he proposes to revise and correct the same?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No one, Sir, in reviewing the comparative charges and receipts of the different ports of the country can fail to be struck by the extreme disparity; but at the same time my hon. Friend will allow me to say that it would be a mistake to estimate the charges of each of those ports by reference to the revenue received, because there are many services to be carried on by the Customs department, and there is the whole business of the prevention of smuggling. These services, of themselves, are unproductive, but must be sustained. But the whole matter is a fit subject for the consideration of the Government, as, indeed, I mentioned at an early period of the Session ; and the Government are engaged in the consideration of what steps can be taken with a view to the diminution of those charges. The subject, however, is a very extensive one, because it connects itself with other questions as to the consolidation in certain instances of duties now carried on in different departments. All I can say is, I can assure my hon. Friend that I am very sensible of the importance of the subject, and very desirous to take measures in the direction to which he points, but it would be impossible to do anything in the present Session.

ROMAN CATHOLICS IN THE NAVY. QUESTION.

MR. BELLEW said, he wished to ask the Secretary of the Admiralty, Whether if there be any objection to carrying into effect the suggestions contained in paragraph No. seven of the Memorial presented to the late Government respecting the treatment of Catholic sailors in the Royal Navy?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the paragraph to which his hon. Friend alluded was to the effect that the religion of every seaman should be stated as part of his description in the office of the Admiralty, and that every seaman should be obliged to describe his religion. The Admiralty did not think it would be advisable or conducive to the harmony and good feeling of the service to enforce such a rule.

THE DISTURBANCES IN SYRIA. QUESTION.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary on a subject in respect to which he had given notice of his intention that evening to move for papers. Could the noble Lord state to the House whether Her Majesty's Government were in possession of any information affirmative of the report which had appeared in the newspapers that troops had been placed on board of French ships of war to be sent to the coast of Syria? Next, he wished to ask whether Her Majesty's Government intended to join with the French Government in any active intervention on that coast? He begged also to inquire what was the nature of the papers which he understood a Member of the Government in the other House had promised should be laid before Parliament on this subject—whether they would be despatches from Her Majesty's representatives in the Levant, or merely a narrative of events? Lastly, he had to ask whether there would be any objection to produce the despatches which the Foreign Office had received from the Consul General at Beyrout?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: We have no intelligence that any troops have been placed on board of French ships with a view to interference in Syria; but the French Government are in communication with the Great Powers of Europe, and I believe with the Porte, with a view to consider whether an intervention should not be made for the purpose of assisting in putting down the authors of the massacres in Syria; and that is a subject which is at present occupying the attention of Her Majesty's Government as well as of the French Government. I do not believe there is any intention on the part of France to act alone in this matter. With regard to any interference on the part of Her Majesty's Government, it will not go beyond that which I stated on a former occasion—namely, that some ships of the Line and other vessels will be stationed on the coast of Syria, with a view to prevent the renewal or continuance of these massacres; and that the Admiral will be empowered, if he thinks it necessary, to land the Marines in Syria, but not to go beyond the coast. The papers to which the hon. Member has referred are now printed, and nearly ready to be produced. They are in fact only the narrative given by the different Consuls in Syria of what has lately taken place there. With respect to the Motion for papers of which the hon. Gentleman has given notice, if he will make the terms of the Motion general and applicable to our other Consuls in Syria as well as the Consul General at Beyrout, I see no objection to its adoption.

Moved, That the House at its rising adjourn till Monday.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I hope, Sir, I may be permitted to avail myself of this opportunity to ask the attention of the House for a very short time in reference to an attack which was made upon me last night in my absence. I am quite sure that the House will not refuse to grant me that indulgence. I learnt, partly from what I heard from Members of this House, and partly from what I have seen this morning, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) came down to the House with papers in his pocket, and made upon me what was certainly a most bitter personal attack. Sir, I think the right hon. Gentleman might have apprised me that such was his intention. I do not know that I had any right to his courtesy, but I think I might have claimed, from that sense of justice and fair dealing which

I believe distinguishes every gentleman and every Englishman, that he should at least have so far apprised me of his intentions, that, if he did not choose to tell me the nature of the attack he meant to make upon me, he might at least have given me such warning that I might have been present in my place to hear what he had to lay to my charge. I shall not, however, further allude to that conduct on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, of the fairness of which I leave the House to be the judge; and I mention it only to excuse myself for now obtruding this matter again on the attention of the House.

The right hon. Gentleman repeated the charge which he made against me some time ago of suppressing papers and wilfully keeping them back from the House. I conceive I have shown, on a former occasion, how groundless that accusation is. In the course of the debate on the second reading of the Bill for the amalgamation of the Indian forces, the right hon. Gentleman quoted a telegram from Lord Clyde dated November, 1858; and so little was I aware of what he was referring to, that I mentioned to my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth (Mr. T. G. Baring), then sitting next to me, that I thought "1858" must be a misprint for "1859." On my suggesting this to him, the right hon. Gentleman said it was not so, but that he found it in a paper which I had suppressed. Now, I have since found that the telegram was contained in papers which were moved for by my hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaid) without the slightest reference to the project for amalgamating the two armies. I was asked by him at the close of last Session whether I had any objection to producing these papers. I objected to presenting them at the time because the inquiry was not complete. I had not seen the papers, and it seemed to me improper, under the circumstances, to agree to their production. At the beginning of this Session my hon. Friend renewed his request, and I at once acceded to it, and the papers were granted, as an unopposed return. Now, it appears to me, that I may fairly say my personal duty was concluded at that time. I cannot hold myself, nor do I think the House will hold me responsible for the progress either of the printing or the correction of the proofs or such other details as are done in the office, and of which I knew nothing. It was not till I inquired next day that I found how the matter stood, and learnt what had happened between the printer and the Secretary of the Military Department. The right hon. Gentleman says I had this brought to my knowledge three days before, and that with that knowledge I stated my ignorance of the fact of these papers being in the office. My hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth stated last night quite truly that I personally had no knowledge whatever of the matter, and I can only repeat my utter denial of having had any knowledge of it at all. I have since found that there was certainly delay in the clerical department of the Military Secretary, and that copies of part of these papers were placed in the hands of some members of the Military Committee of my Council; but neither I nor my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth saw those papers. From those members of the Council—whether directly or indirectly, I know not, and I care not to know—the right hon. Gentleman must have obtained his information of the contents of those papers, which up to the time when the debate took place I had never seen; but I am quite certain that no member of my Council, who are all men of honour, would ever have said or insinuated what is undoubtedly untrue—namely, that I had wilfully kept back or suppressed these documents. That charge must, therefore, have emanated from the right hon. Gentleman's own imagination.

Sir Charles Wood

I come now to the new accusation which the right hon. Gentleman has brought against me. He stated last night that he moved for some papers on the 28th of June. That statement is not correct. It was on the 28th of June that the notice of Motion appeared on the Votes. The notice which stood in the right hon. Gentleman's name was for three papers:—First, a correspondence which took place, not in my time, but in the year 1858, between the Secretary for War and the noble Lord opposite, then President of the Board of Control; secondly, the opinions of the law officers of the Crown; and, thirdly, some despatches. The 28th happened to be the day of the meeting of my Council, and also that fixed for the second reading of the European Forces Bill. Hon. Members will easily imagine that it was a busy day with me, and, in fact, it was not until I came to this House and took up the Papers that I saw the right hon. Gentleman's notice. The first notice was for the production of a correspondence between the Secretaries of State for War and India.

The papers, if they existed, must, of course, have been in both departments, and it would not have been right for me to have consented to their production without the consent of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Sidney Herbert). I showed him the notice, and asked whether his attention had been called to it, and whether he knew anything about the papers? My right hon. Friend told me that the papers were not in existence. In the course of the evening the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud came and sat down upon the Treasury Bench on the other side of my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth (Mr. T. G. Baring) with whom I was sitting, and asked me if I had any objection to the production of these papers? I told him that I had seen the notice but a short time before; that I had spoken to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, who had told me that the first papers were not in existence; that with regard to the second paper which he wished to move for he must know that it was not the practice to produce the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown, but that to the production of the third set of papers, which was the only set which belonged exclusively to the Indian Department, I had no objection, and that he might move for them as an unopposed return. That is all that passed on that occasion. The right hon. Gentleman said last night—

“The right hon. Gentleman told me it did not exist. I told him I knew it did exist, and that it was in his own office, and I begged I might have the correspondence. I told him the correspondence was in his own office. He insisted it was not.”

I beg to assure the House that that is a perfectly imaginary conversation; one which never took place. I did not say, and I could not have said what the right hon. Gentleman attributes to me, because the only information which I possessed as to the existence or non-existence of the papers was derived from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, who must have known from his own office whether they existed or not. Having seen the notice for the first time in this House, and having had no opportunity of inquiring at my office, it is impossible that I could have said anything as to the existence of the papers there. I stated what had been told me by my right hon. Friend, who was a perfectly competent person to give information, because the papers must have existed in his office as well as in mine. Fortunately I have a witness as to this conversation, because my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth was sitting between the right hon. Gentleman and myself. He heard every word that passed, and will, if necessary, confirm my assertion that no such conversation as that stated by the right hon. Gentleman took place upon that occasion. From that time forward I never heard a syllable upon the subject from the right hon. Gentleman, until on Wednesday I received the letter which he read to the House last night. He did not move for the papers which he states that I had in my possession at the time. Some days afterwards, however, he moved that portion of the notice to which I had said that I had no objection. The right hon. Gentleman also said last night that, on Tuesday I think, he showed these papers to my right hon. Friend. The very statement which he made in the next sentence showed that he did no such thing, because he said that my right hon. Friend asked him for the dates of the papers, in order that he might inquire whether or not they did exist, and promised to give an answer when he came to the House that night. My right hon. Friend did not come down to the House that evening, and therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman moved for the papers next day, and stated that it was an unopposed return, he did so without the slightest warrant, because neither from my right hon. Friend nor from myself had he heard that we did not object to their production. The right hon. Gentleman went on to state what, in point of fact, he could not know, that my right hon. Friend told me of the information which he had received from him, that it was he himself who, in point of fact, gave me the information which enabled me to find the papers, and that therefore when I wrote to tell him that I had found them, and offered their production, he owed me very little gratitude. That, again, is totally inaccurate. What really happened was this, that on Tuesday morning last I saw a notice of Motion for the production of papers given by the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans); I sent for the papers, and on seeing them, which I then did for the first time, I found that they were apparently those for which the right hon. Gentleman had asked me on the 28th of June. I immediately went to the Horse Guards and asked the Commander-in-Chief, one of whose letters was included in the correspondence, whether he had any objection to its production. I then came to this House with the papers in my pocket, intending to show them to my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War, and ask whether he had any objection to their being produced. As I have already said, my right hon. Friend was not in the House that evening, and it was not until Wednesday morning that I had an opportunity of showing to him for the first time the papers in question. On receiving from him the assurance that he had no objection to their production, I took the earliest opportunity that I properly could to inform the right hon. Member for Stroud that I had no objection to the production of the papers, and that he might move for them as an unopposed return. I quite admit that I did not inquire for the papers in my own office until I saw the notice of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster. I relied upon the information of my right hon. Friend that they were not in existence, and my attention was not again attracted to the subject until I saw the notice of the gallant Member for Westminster. In answer to my note I received a not very civil letter from the right hon. Gentleman, which was delivered to me when the Cabinet was sitting, and which I showed to my right hon. Friend, pointing out to him the inaccuracies of the statement which it contained. So much for the question of the papers.

I wish before I sit down to make a very few observations upon another charge of the right hon. Gentleman as to my conduct towards the Indian Council. I do not intend to go into that question at large, and so far as the charge concerns myself I should be quite disposed to let it pass; but I think that if I suffered it to remain uncontradicted it might be painful to the members of the Council of India, who are not quite so well used as I am to the habitual language of the right hon. Gentleman. He stated that I had treated the members of the Council with contempt, and had reduced them to insignificance. Now, Sir, I am happy to say that from the first nothing could be more satisfactory or agreeable than my intercourse with the members of the Council. There has been the most full, frank, and free intercourse between us upon all subjects, and so smoothly has the system worked that I do not think the Council has been divided more than half a dozen times. Upon the question of the Indian army, no doubt, I differed from the council, and they complained that I had not consulted them formally before the decision of the Government was come to. I have stated the reasons why that course was not taken in a paper which is on the table of the House. I beg that hon. Gentlemen will bear in mind that the question is not whether I consulted every member of the Council fully and completely upon the subject, or whether or not I was in complete possession of their opinions. It was my duty to make myself acquainted with the opinions of all persons of weight and authority on Indian matters, not only in the Council, but out of the Council, before I came to any decision upon so momentous a question. The question simply is whether the members of the Council were formally consulted in such a manner as to enable them, under the provisions of the Act, to record their opinions. Now, Sir, for the reasons which are stated in the paper to which I have already referred—namely, that it was a question for the decision of the Government, and not of the Council—this did not appear to me to be a matter which came under the words of the Act. Such a course can only be taken when a difference of opinion arises upon a question to be decided in the Indian Council; but the question of the army is one for the decision, not of the Council, but of the Cabinet. I did not take this course merely upon my own authority. I consulted my colleagues in the Government upon the subject, and it was their unanimous decision that it was the right course to adopt. It was the course taken by the previous Government, who came to a decision upon the question of the Indian army, but did not consult the Indian Council before they did so. I put it to every hon. Member of this House whether a course which was thought right by the Government which created the Council, and by the Government which succeeded, can be properly said to be a course which was intended by me to throw contempt upon the Indian Council, and to reduce it to insignificance. In point of fact, as soon as I thought that I could properly put the question before the Council, in order to enable the members to record their opinions upon it, I did so. I may have been wrong in doing so, but at all events, if I erred I erred on the side of wishing to show deference to their opinions. I made the offer to them twice, once to the whole Council, and again to the vice-president, and they declined to avail themselves of it. Ultimately, when, after a long interval, they came to the conclusion that they wished to record their opinions, I took the same step which I had offered to do before, and which enabled them to do so.

Sir Charles Wood

The next point to which I wish to allude has reference to two Bills which are not before the House, but with the contents of which, as discussed in the Council, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud seems to be well acquainted. I know not, of course, whence he received his information, but he should have stated correctly, if at all, the circumstances connected with those two Bills. He gave the House to understand that, upon the measures in question, I differed wholly and entirely from my Council, whose opinions, I think he added, though I may be wrong, I was disposed to override.

MR. HORSMAN: I did not say so.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I may have been misinformed.

MR. HORSMAN:—What I said was that you differed from a majority of your Council.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: It so happens that upon one of the Bills, that relating to the establishment of certain high courts of judicature, there was no difference of opinion at all in the Council.

MR. HORSMAN: I did not allude to it.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: As to the other Bill, that relating to the Civil Service, there was no difference of opinion in the Council except upon one clause. Upon one clause there was a difference of opinion, but a large minority concurred in the view which I took, and therefore I did not differ from the whole of my Council, far less did I attempt to override their opinion. I agreed with a large minority and determined to introduce the clause into the Bill. The clause was not a child of my own brain. It was prepared by the noble Lord who preceded me in the office of Secretary of State for India, and who left behind him a Bill ready drawn, going further than I propose to do in the clause to which I refer. Here, again, I may be right or I may be wrong; I am not going to discuss the merits of the question, but it cannot justly be said that to proceed in a course which was thought expedient by two successive Secretaries of State, and by a large minority of the Indian Council, is treating the Council with contempt or overriding the opinion of a majority of its members. I do not wish to prolong my explanation beyond that which seems to be necessary to vindicate myself from charges made without any foundation whatever. It is not my intention to enter into the question of the merits either of the Bills to which I have alluded, or of the course which I may ultimately think necessary to take upon them. My object has been to show the utter and complete inaccuracy of the statement which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud has made with reference to the production of certain documents, and to prove that the charge of having treated with contempt the members of the Indian Council—gentlemen from whom I have received the most cordial assistance, and to whom I have on many occasions expressed my warmest gratitude—is wholly without foundation. I should feel ashamed of myself if I had left uncontradicted a charge which, however it may affect me, could not but inflict serious pain upon them.

MR. HORSMAN: I do not think I have any complaint to make of the tone or even, so far as I could hear it, of the matter of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. But there is one remarkable omission, at which, considering that he was complaining of my having attacked him in his absence yesterday, I cannot help feeling some astonishment. His complaint is that I attacked him in his absence. Will he be good enough to inform us why or how the spirit moved him to leave the House immediately before I rose to address it? I think that is not altogether, in the circumstances, either an uninteresting or an unimportant question. I saw the right hon. Gentleman in the House very shortly before I rose to address it, and, not being able, from this seat, to see what Minister may or may not be in his place, I had a right to believe that the right hon. Gentleman was on the Treasury bench, because he had one very great advantage of me and of other Members of the House who were not in the secrets of the Cabinet, and who came down here yesterday in the innocent belief that it was the intention of the Government to render the present Session to some extent, at least, memorable as having witnessed the passing of one useful measure. Having abandoned their Reform Bill, and having met with an accident in their finance, there was an impression that they intended to adhere to their only other important measure, and to amend the Law of Bankruptcy, in order to save themselves from the disgrace of complete political insolvency. We came down yesterday, therefore, under the firm belief that the Bankruptcy Bill was to take up the whole evening. I came to the House with not the least idea that we were to go into Committee of Supply, with not the least expectation that I would have an opportunity either of making that speech or reading that correspondence, during the speaking and reading of which the right hon. Gentleman as it appears was so unaccountably and strangely absent. But the right hon. Gentleman knew what I did not know. He knew that the Bankruptcy Bill was to be given up; he knew that we were to go into Committee of Supply; he knew that the Indian Army Bill stood first among the orders for to-day, and he knew that the noble Lord at the head of the Government was going to announce that fact unexpectedly to the House. Moreover, he had my letter in his pocket; he saw me in my place; he knew that the announcement of the Prime Minister would call me up, and that I should make a statement to which it would be his duty to reply. Yet the right hon. Gentleman suddenly vanished from the House, and having done so he ventures to accuse me of attacking him in his absence. Every hon. Member of the House knows that upon the Motion for going into Committee of Supply Ministers are liable to have questions put to them, but it so happens in the present instance that the right hon. Gentleman was aware that a question would be addressed to him. He knew that a discussion would be raised on the subject of the Indian army. I saw him in his place immediately before; I believed he was still in his place when I rose to address the House, and he has yet to explain how it was he left the House at the very moment a discussion was coming on in which he knew it would be his duty to take part. The right hon. Gentleman has said that I brought the correspondence down yesterday on purpose to read it and make an attack upon him. It is obvious I could have done no such thing, because I thought the Bankruptcy Bill would take up the whole evening, and I could not foresee that I should have an opportunity of reading the correspondence. I brought it down for the purpose of showing it to my hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson), who had given notice of an Amendment upon the Motion for going into Committee on the Indian Army Bill, and I told my hon. Friend that after that correspondence, which I supposed the noble Lord at the head of the Government had seen, the Bill would probably be postponed until the papers promised to us were in our hands. I said the same thing to other Members of the House whom I see in their places, and I have no doubt they will, if necessary, confirm my statement. I did not intend to read the correspondence. But the noble Lord at the head of the Government suddenly got up and, without any question being put to him, volunteered a statement to the effect that the first business taken to-day would be the Indian Army Bill. [Viscount PALMERSTON: A question was put to me.] The noble Lord will excuse me. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks asked a question about the paper duties, and another about fortifications, and the noble Lord stated that those subjects would not come on to-day, adding that the Indian Army Bill, on which no question had been put to him, would be taken first. I heard that with great surprise. I believed the Secretary of State for India was in his place, and I am not sure, even now, that he did not hear the noble Lord make that announcement. I expected him to rise after the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham. I was surprised he did not. I rose, therefore, on the impulse of the moment. Before coming into the House I had no design of speaking or of reading the correspondence; but that sudden announcement having been made by the noble Lord, believing that the right hon. Gentleman was in his place, and believing likewise that the correspondence was known to the Prime Minister, I thought myself justified in reading it to the House. I cannot help thinking that what has taken place raises an important question as to the treatment by the right hon. Gentleman of his own colleagues. His conduct towards them seems to have been quite as objectionable as his conduct towards the House. What did we hear last night from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster? That the right hon. Gentleman had not made known to his colleagues the opposition which was to be raised to the Indian Army Bill. His letter was delivered to me with a message that he was at the Cabinet, and begging I would send my answer to the Cabinet. I did so. He received it in the presence of his colleagues. They must have been at that time discussing, among other things, the business of the House, and considering what measures they should sacrifice in order to shorten the Session. I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman ought not to have told his colleagues that his Indian Bills were going to be strongly opposed, and that any attempt to press them through the House of Commons in the absence of papers which had been ordered, would probably prolong the Session several days? If he had made that known to his colleagues what would have happened? Can any one doubt that something would have happened similar to that which took place yesterday, when the noble Lord at the head of the Government, instantly he became aware of the circumstances, administered a severe practical rebuke to his colleague, by postponing the very Bill which the right hon. Gentleman, with a full knowledge of those circumstances, had endeavoured to press forward with undue haste? If my letter had been placed in the hands of the noble Lord he would have said "Oh! our clever Secretary of State has got us into another mess about these Indian papers, and we must get out of it by tying these Indian Bills to the Attorney General's Bill, and by throwing them over together." Every one who knew the good sense and fair dealing of the noble Lord, must feel that that would have been the course he would have pursued. But the right hon. Gentleman did not give his colleagues that opportunity. He suppressed the fact that these Bills were going to be strongly opposed; and what more did he do? The right hon. Gentleman presses the Bill on, gives it precedence over all other measures, though a short Bill and the least urgent, and at the same time, with considerate and characteristic generosity, he graciously promises these papers, which he knows he has taken sure means to make too late. What could be the reason of his writing to me on Wednesday, telling me I might move for these papers which I held to be essential to the discussion of the Bill at the very moment when he put the Bill at the head of the Orders of the Day for Friday? The right hon. Gentleman took every means in his power to get the Bill on before the papers could be before the House. Under these circumstances, I can only repeat that I feel that the right hon. Gentleman has neither behaved fairly to this House nor to his colleagues; that the information we gave to him ought to have been laid before his colleagues, and that the Bill ought to have been postponed.

Mr. Horsman

I will state very shortly what the right hon. Gentleman said about the papers. My statement last night was that the right hon.

Gentleman led us into many divisions by assuring us that he knew nothing whatever of the papers, and he himself had shown by his own statement that it was known to his Secretary, if not to himself, that they were at the time in the printer's hands. Remember that on the morning of the 28th these divisions took place. At the evening sitting of that day the right hon. Gentleman told the House that there were still 300 pages to be printed—that the printing had been delayed by the papers being sent back to a department of his own office, and kept there for revision, and that this matter was not brought to his notice by the Under Secretary until the 27th ultimo, when a note was written stating that hon. Members were inquiring for the papers. This was before the divisions took place, and then came an enigmatical sentence from the right hon. Gentleman stating that the steps he had taken upon that information evinced a desire on his part that the printing should be pressed on as rapidly as possible. Does not that mean that the steps taken were the getting the papers out of the hands of the Military Secretary, and sending them to the printer? What else does it mean? The hon. Under Secretary was sitting by the side of the right hon. Gentleman when he made his statement, and must naturally have felt that the printer had nothing to do with it.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that he was not by the side of the Secretary for India at the time.

MR. SPEAKER observed that, though he had not hitherto interrupted the right hon. Gentleman, he must now point out that reading from newspapers a report of a debate in that House was out of order.

MR. HORSMAN: I should not have alluded to that matter unless the right hon. Gentleman had referred to it; but may I not ask another question about the papers? Is it not a fact that the printing of them was retarded by the right hon. Gentleman or his Secretary, in order to make way for more pressing matter which the right hon. Gentleman had in hand? I will not descend into the question whether the conversation between the right hon. Gentleman and myself was imaginary or not; but the right hon. Gentleman is inaccurate in one point. He says that the Under-Secretary was sitting by when the conversation occurred. There were, however, two conversations, and after I returned to my seat the right hon. Gentleman invited me back again, when we had a second conversation. Again, the right hon. Gentleman said that I showed the papers to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War. I mentioned the date of the papers, but I never professed to have seen or have shown the papers. With respect to the conversation which occurred with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, if he states that there is any difference on that point I will admit the error to be on my side. I will not follow the right hon. Gentleman into the subject of the conversations that took place. My statement was short, and next week we shall have another opportunity of going into the matter; but I stated that with respect to the Indian Army Bill the right hon. Gentleman was at issue with the whole of the Council, and with respect to the Civil Service Bill he was at issue with the majority of the Council, though, according to the Act of Parliament, it was expected that he should take them into counsel; and that he had not given to the Indian Council the weight and authority which Parliament intended. I stated that during the whole of the Session complaints were made against the right hon. Gentleman, which I am not disposed to modify or retract; that we had the utmost difficulty in getting requisite information; that he had himself misinformed us as to the papers in his office, and that when he promised we should have the papers before going into Committee on the Bill, he nevertheless pressed on the Bill before the papers were in the hands of Members. On the 28th of June I put a Notice on the Paper for other papers, and it was not till three weeks after that the right hon. Gentleman admitted that these papers were in existence. Would any other Minister, after notice had been put on the Paper, and after he was told that these papers were in existence, have been three weeks without inquiring whether they existed or not, while during the whole of that period he was pressing forward the Bill on the table with indecent haste? All those interested in Indian affairs concur in the opinion that the right hon. Gentleman has not treated us fairly, has not given us information in time, and has hurried on his Bill unduly, has overridden the Indian Council, not giving them a due opportunity of recording their dissent. There are dissents with respect to the Civil Service Bill, but they are not yet laid upon the table. I have nothing more to say. I think I have shown that in the first instance I am not responsible for the absence of the right hon. Gentleman, and that if there is any inconvenience accruing to him from that absence he himself is the not unintentional cause of it. I have shown that I did not come here to read the correspondence, but that I was induced to do so by the speech of the noble Lord, and I can only say that I do not modify, qualify, or retract one single syllable of the complaint I made.

Mr. Horsman

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he rose to explain why he left the House on the previous night. An hon. Friend brought him a message that Sir Richard Airey wished to see him, and he went out of the House to speak to him.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—As the right hon. Gentleman has alluded to me I wish to say one or two words on the matter. I must say that I never heard a more lame apology or excuse for the most discourteous and unfair proceeding that ever took place in my memory in the House of Commons than that which the right hon. Gentleman has attempted to make. I hope and believe that the right hon. Gentleman is the only Member in this House who would have so conducted himself on such an occasion. What is the statement of the right hon. Gentleman? Why, forsooth! he had in his pocket the correspondence which he said he brought down for the purpose of showing to me. ["No, no!"]

MR. HORSMAN: I said that I brought it down for the purpose of showing it to the hon. Member for Ayrshire.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Well, that makes the matter worse. The right hon. Gentleman had in his pocket a correspondence which he thought afforded good reasons why I, having announced yesterday that the India Army Amalgamation Bill would come on to-day, ought not to persist in that Motion, and yet the right hon. Gentleman now says that he had no intention to show me that correspondence. The right hon. Gentleman says that he had fair reason to suppose because he had seen my right hon. Friend the Secretary for India in the House at an early period of the evening that therefore he must have been in the House when he made the attack, because he thought that every Member of Government should be in the House of Commons when Supply comes on. That is a rule which I do not find recorded in the Orders of the House, but we will assume, therefore, that it was the rule which the right hon. Gentleman observed when he was in office. Now, let me in common fairness ask this question. A Member may be in the neighbourhood of the House, or he may leave it for a short time, but does it follow that he is necessarily to remain here? Even when a call of the House takes place he is not compelled to stay in his place afterwards; and, therefore, no man is entitled to assume that because a Member is present at a particular moment he is necessarily to be present half-an-hour or an hour later. But the right hon. Gentleman had in his head and in his pocket an attack—a virulent, an unfair, an unhandsome attack on my right hon. Friend. I will not use strong language, though I might do so if I followed the example of the right hon. Gentleman, who yesterday made use of expressions which I did not think it worth while to notice, because they are not such as are usual in this House. Why, Sir, any man of common feeling and of common generosity—any man who felt and knew the social obligations existing between man and man would, before he got up to make such an attack, have taken the trouble to ascertain whether my right hon. Friend was in his place, and remained in his place. He ought also to have given my right hon. Friend notice of his intention. Perhaps that would be expecting too much from the right hon. Gentleman, but any other man in the House would have given such a notice. He saw my right hon. Friend in the early part of the evening. Why did he not go up to him and say, “I am going to animadvert on your conduct and to read a correspondence which has passed between us; pray have the goodness to stay in your place?” That is the course which hon. Members usually take, and had that course been taken here, and had my right hon. Friend not then attended in his place, the right hon. Gentleman would have been entitled to say that the Secretary for India had mysteriously absented himself after full notice given of an attack which it was evident, therefore, he was unprepared to meet.

That, however, is not the state of the case. The right hon. Gentleman says that I brought it all upon my right hon. Friend. Now, what was my statement yesterday? Not that the Indian Army Bill was coming on last evening. The right hon. Gentleman was not driven into a corner, as it were, by such an announcement; though even then I think the courtesy usual between Member and Member would have led him to go to my right hon. Friend and say to him, “You have given notice of a Bill to-night, and I have reasons why I think it is one which ought not to come on. There are papers which I think most important to be produced in order to its due consideration, and they have not been produced. I am sure you will feel the impropriety of bringing on that Bill to-night.” That would have been a very proper appeal, and, under such circumstances, I should have felt myself authorized to comply with his request. Then, the right hon. Gentleman says I volunteered the statement. Sir, I did no such thing. I was asked a question about the course of public business. Minute details do not impress themselves very distinctly upon the memory, but what occurred, I think, was this:—I was asked a question respecting the course of business, not for yesterday only but for to-day, and I stated—if not in answer to a direct question, at all events from a desire to give full information—what measures would be taken this evening. That being so, and the Bill to which the right hon. Gentleman objected standing not for last night but for this evening, there was surely ample time for the courteous appeal which hon. Gentlemen usually make in such cases, stating reasons why the Bill should not come on as proposed. But the right hon. Gentleman is also omniscient. It seems that he has his ear at the keyhole of the Indian Council, and knows completely everything that passes there. He knows who is consulted, and which way minorities and majorities go; he knows even the assumed feelings of the Members of the Council, who, he says, believe that they are reduced to insignificance by my right hon. Friend. Well, Sir, I must ask the right hon. Gentleman to confine his mysterious knowledge to the Indian Council, and not extend it by leading us to infer that his ear is equally applied to the keyhole of the Cabinet. He states with the utmost confidence, and in that sort of offhand way in which he makes his assertions, that at the time when my right hon. Friend received a communication from him the Cabinet were discussing the measures they intended to drop, and those they would go on with. Now, I am bound to secrecy, though the right hon. Gentleman seems to be released from any obligation of the kind. Without violating my duty, however, I may go so far as to say that the right hon. Gentleman has been speaking of matters of which he is totally and entirely ignorant. That is not, perhaps, a singular case. But, on the part of my Colleagues, I can assure the House that we grant the right hon. Gentleman our full forgiveness for any imaginary breach of the secrecy of the Cabinet which he conceives himself at liberty to commit. I think the right hon. Gentleman has made out no case whatever, and I most sincerely lament, from the regard which I have for him personally, that he should have done what I am sure every man who both observes and values the courteous mode of proceeding usual between Members of this House must have regarded with the greatest concern and regret.

MR. HORSMAN : The noble Lord misunderstood me in one point. I said distinctly that my intention to speak was owing to his own announcement, my full belief being that he had seen my communication.

KENSINGTON GARDENS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he wished to divert the House to more harmonious topics. Hon. Members would probably not be sorry to stop a discussion of a most unfortunate character, and which he thought was not calculated to increase the public respect for this House. He had given notice of a question which involved the comfort and convenience of many thousands of the inhabitants of the Metropolis, and the House would probably allow him shortly to direct their attention to the subject. He referred to the encroachment which, under the direction of the First Commissioner of Works, had been made upon the tranquillity and privacy of Kensington Gardens. Some few days since the inhabitants of that portion of the Metropolis were very much surprised to find a road staked out in those gardens with a large number of iron hurdles. At first they thought it was the contemplated road between Tyburnia and Belgravia, so much desired for the accommodation of the public; but it turned out that the right hon. Gentleman had merely apportioned that strip of ground for the convenience of equestrians, male and female, more especially lawyers and doctors. The right hon. Gentleman said it would enliven the neighbourhood if they had an opportunity of seeing lawyers and doctors riding there for exercise; and, he added, that those persons, when they did ride, were obliged, their time being limited, to ride as fast as they could. Now, if there was one thing calculated to make a man feel the reverse of lively, it was the sight of a lawyer on horseback. Sedentary people, it had been observed, seldom had a good seat, and, to employ a legal phrase, he might say that a lawyer had never entered into a covenant for quiet enjoyment with the animal on whose back he was mounted. To such persons mischievous boys were in the habit of saying, "Don't you think, Sir, you would be more comfortable if you were to get inside?" Equestrian lawyers, therefore, were the last persons in the world calculated to excite admiration, which was one of the grounds mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman for the formation of this new ride. As to doctors, he believed they very seldom rode; but he was quite sure that they would henceforth frequent this spot on the chance of the accidents which could certainly occur there. An important memorial against the road had already been presented by the inhabitants, and a deputation had waited on the right hon. Gentleman. Their remonstrance against the innovation was based on no vulgar feeling, as between pedestrians and equestrians, the lower orders and the upper ten thousand. The memorial was signed by 1,500 of some of the wealthiest inhabitants of the neighbourhood; and the deputation was attended by merchants and gentlemen of position, headed by an able Judge, the Recorder of London. They stated that they remonstrated on account of the threatened interference with the tranquillity of these gardens; and as an instance, it was mentioned that the very day before two large dogs were noticed which were following some persons on horseback, and which, having got through the hurdles, frightened almost into convulsions some of the small children who were playing there at the time. The reply of the right hon. Gentleman was, "I will take care it is put a stop to; and I will put a green man," was the right hon. Gentleman's expression, "to see that no dogs shall be running about." It would be a very green man, indeed, who would attempt to interfere with a large St. Bernard mastiff, or a deerhound which might be following his master at full speed up the ride. Another argument used by the right hon. Gentleman was, that persons on foot like to see the riders. But what was the answer of those who desired to retain the privacy of the gardens? They said, "Let those who like to see the riders go to that part where thousands of persons with such tastes do go, Rotten Row." There they could see doctors, lawyers, and the more accomplished equestrian, who—

Viscount Palmerston

"With one heel insidiously aside, Provokes the caper he pretends to chide."

But those who wanted to send their children to the gardens in safety were not those who wanted to see riders. He had given notice that he should ask the right hon. Gentleman whether Her Majesty had given her sanction to a ride being formed in Kensington Gardens, and as he was extremely unwilling to bring that illustrious name unnecessarily into any subject of debate, he would state his reason for putting the question. Those gardens had always been considered as the property of the Crown, and they had always been devoted to the use of pedestrians. As far back as 1705 they read of the fact that Sir Isaac Newton wandered there during the latter part of his life, and died in the neighbourhood; Crabbe wrote many of his poems there; Mill, the Indian historian, availed himself of their privacy; Her Majesty drew her first breath in Kensington Palace; she there held her first Council, which had been described in the gorgeous language of the author of Sybil. The public therefore naturally believed that the gardens were more particularly the property of the Crown. No monarch had ever been more solicitous for the comfort and convenience of her subjects than her gracious Majesty; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman was bound to state to the House whether before taking any step he had obtained the sanction of the Sovereign. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord Enfield) in introducing a deputation, put a question to the right hon. Gentleman, who gave an answer that was perfectly astonishing. The noble Lord asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had received any applications from anybody before he made this encroachment, and the answer was there had been no applications. Then at whose suggestion had it been done? Applications for similar encroachments had been made to former Commissioners of Works, and they had uniformly refused them. In 1851, a ride was made for equestrians out of Kensington Gardens, but that was only because a large portion of the space which had been long appropriated to equestrians was occupied by the Exhibition building.

Upon that occasion a great movement took place, and a deputation waited upon Lord Seymour, who gave a pledge that when the Crystal Palace was removed the new ride should be discontinued. In the present instance he thought the public had some right to complain that the right hon. Gentleman, from some motives of ambition, perhaps, that he might do something in his ædileship which former First Commissioners had not ventured to do, that was, take away from pedestrians a large portion of Kensington Gardens, upon the plea that equestrians had not already a sufficient space for exercise. A more fallacious plea could not be urged. At present an equestrian could start from the bottom of Great George Street, along Birdcage Walk, up Constitution Hill, gallop up and down Rotten Row as much as he pleased, and then could make the circuit of the Park, which would afford an amount of exercise amply sufficient for any doctor or lawyer, or more than most of them could endure. The right hon. Gentleman had done an act which was much to be regretted, and which it was to be hoped upon reconsideration he would undo. It was unpleasant to suggest anything that could wound the amour propre of any official, but the right hon. Gentleman had so many brilliant examples among his colleagues in the Government, of how easy it was to withdraw measures, that he might now feel inclined to withdraw the iron hurdles in Kensington Gardens. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would seriously reconsider the question, and having had the discomfort and inconvenience which his plan would create explained to him, would not persist in a scheme which was so objectionable. He would conclude by asking whether the First Commissioner of Works had obtained the sanction of the Crown to take a portion of Kensington Gardens before setting out the Road for Equestrians, which has been done under his direction.

MR. HUBBARD said, he should have imagined, from the energy displayed by the hon. and learned Member, that the subject he brought under the notice of the House was some grave constitutional question, instead of an attack upon an arrangement which during the last ten days had been a source of enjoyment to himself (Mr. Hubbard), and his family. He had inquired of the police and park-keepers, who ridiculed the idea of danger to any one from the ride being made there, and stated that not a single child had been run over. The only difficulty was, as he was told, that some of the ladies' crinolines would not pass through the openings between the hurdles. The police and keepers also told him that before the rails were put up they never saw any persons crossing in that direction. It was a great convenience for equestrians, but he could not support it if he believed that it would cause any inconvenience or danger to pedestrians.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that with all due respect to the hon. Member who spoke last, he did not think that the "green men" were the best judges upon this question. There was not the slightest wish to encroach upon that portion of the Park which had for very many years been enjoyed by equestrians, but those whom he represented thought the rights of pedestrians should be equally sacred. The deputation that waited upon the right hon. Gentleman the day before was composed of most respectable gentlemen who lived in the neighbourhood, some for many years. It was no vulgar cry against the "upper ten thousand," but it was a question whether the inhabitants of that most respectable neighbourhood, who had for years enjoyed the comfort, the safety, and the privacy of Kensington Gardens, were now to be deprived of that enjoyment. The right hon. Gentleman had shown in many Metropolitan improvements so much desire to meet the wishes of the public, that it was to be hoped he would reconsider his decision on the present occasion, and not persist in a scheme which no one appeared to have asked for. If the right hon. Gentleman could show that representations had been made to him that the safety and convenience of equestrians demanded the formation of a new ride, he (Lord Enfield), although he might deplore the conclusion arrived at, would not say anything against it; but if no such representations had been made to him, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider the matter, and, frankly admitting that he had committed an error of judgment, would in a short time restore Kensington Gardens to the same condition in which they were a few weeks since.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON:—Having visited the spot to ascertain what grounds there are for complaint, I am bound to say that I believe there is no reasonable foundation for objection, and, in fact, I for one feel extremely obliged to the right hon.

Mr. Hubbard

Gentleman. The noble Lord asked whether the ride has been made in consequence of any petitions for it. But however that might be, I am quite sure that numerous signed petitions could be soon obtained against the removal of the ride. Looking dispassionately at the arrangements that have been made, I am bound to say they are such as to leave not the slightest ground of reasonable complaint. There is no obstruction, for every twenty yards there are openings in the hurdles, through which persons can pass, and to say that the number of horses that will be found there will cause any obstruction is pure nonsense. The hon. and learned Gentleman tells us that in 1851 Kensington Gardens were opened temporarily for equestrians, but the arrangement then was totally different. The ride then was across the very centre of the gardens; and when he speaks of the large space taken away from pedestrians, I beg to say, as the result of my observation, that no space at all has been taken from them. The ride, such as it is, is very narrow; it is round the external margin of the gardens, and there still remains a very large space entirely unencroached upon for those who frequent the gardens on foot. The hon. and learned Gentleman talks of the privacy of the gardens, and certainly there is privacy, for when I have been there I have scarcely seen any one. But, practically the result of this innovation is, that where there was one pedestrian before, you will now find ten drawn thither to enjoy the increased liveliness of the gardens caused by this ride. I think it is a most rational and acceptable addition to the enjoyment of that portion of the public who take horse exercise, without detracting one iota from pedestrians; and I earnestly hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not be deterred by what appears a most unreasonable outcry from allowing those who take exercise on horseback to continue it.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he did not think this subject worthy the consideration of the House. The opposition had originated with a few locally interested parties, who forgot that the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests possessed his authority not for the benefit of any particular section of the inhabitants of the Metropolis alone, but for those also from distant parts of the country who were obliged to spend a certain number of months every year in London. He wished to impress on the right hon. Gentleman that he was acting for the benefit of the whole community, and in the height of the London season this ride was the only place where equestrians could take exercise. There was not sufficient room anywhere else, for equestrians had increased three or fourfold within the last six or seven years.

MR. COWPER said, he had no hesitation in saying he had not made this opening into Kensington Gardens in consequence of any representations that were made to him by any person whatever; and he took on himself the responsibility of originating it. It originated thus:—He thought in the management of the Parks intrusted to him, it was his duty to follow the maxim of seeking the greatest happiness of the greatest number; and observing the great number of persons who derived enjoyment in Hyde Park, from sitting in chairs, and watching the horses in Rotten Row, and also those in carriages who were amused in the same way, it occurred to him that the enjoyment and recreation of the public would be promoted by giving similar facilities for conjunctions of riders and walkers in some of those very beautiful portions of that magnificent area of Kensington Gardens, which were little frequented, and to a small extent subserved the recreation and amusement of the public. On a careful examination of the gardens, it appeared to him that if riders when they reached the western end of Rotten Row were enabled to pass through one of those avenues, which confessedly were not much frequented, although near the great broad walk, he should enable a larger number of persons to receive enjoyment and recreation from the western end of Kensington Gardens. Then by carrying the ride along the northern edge of Kensington Gardens, which was not used, he would enable persons who wished to ride from Bayswater to Kensington to have the advantage of a communication through these avenues. He fixed the hurdles in a temporary manner, he made no new gates, he incurred no expense. What had been done was manifestly in its nature temporary. The ride could only be open during the summer months. In its present state it would hardly be safe for horses in winter. When the time came for closing the ride at the end of the season he thought he should be able to ascertain what was really the preponderance of public opinion on the subject, so as to guide the person who occupied the office he now filled in deciding whether it would be right again to give the public the advantage and enjoyment of that ride in summer. Now, as far as he had been able to observe, he thought the preponderance, certainly of reason, was much in favour of the ride. The argument against it was that it interfered with the quiet and retirement of persons who had hitherto frequented that portion of the gardens. He could only say that if some few solitary persons who desired to be alone were prevented from pursuing their quiet meditations in that particular avenue, on account of the admittance of horses, there was ample space in the 300 acres of Kensington Gardens where they could still find themselves beyond the sound of the trampling of horses; but he thought it very doubtful whether the passage of persons on horseback did at all interfere with the quiet enjoyment of pedestrians. He felt that there would be great objection to bringing the traffic of the town through such a place as Kensington Gardens. He certainly should not desire to see any portion of Kensington Gardens, in its present condition, used for business purposes. He thought the uses of the Park were mainly for the enjoyment and recreation of the public, and such should be the primary object. The objections founded on the assumed interference with the privacy and quiet of the gardens proceeded mainly from the inhabitants of the immediate neighbourhood of the western end of Kensington Gardens; it was from some of them he had what he thought a strange remonstrance. They spoke of the ride as an invasion of their rights. Not content to regard it as a simple affair of public convenience and enjoyment, they joined with persons who were trying to swell the matter into a great social and political question. But when he asked what rights had been invaded, he could get no answer. The residents in Notting-hill and Kensington assumed that they had some privileged and exclusive right in the gardens; and the exclusion of all but pedestrians would practically exclude those who lived too far off to frequent the gardens on foot, but who could easily reach them by riding. Now, he asked by what right did they seek to exclude those who took exercise on horseback? The grounds were maintained by grants from the public money. The inhabitants of Kensington had no more right to them, either by payment or in any other way than any other portion of the public. The soil was the property of the Queen, and the money spent in maintaining them was public money. It was difficult, therefore, to make out that by admitting the general public on horseback there could be an invasion of anybody's rights. He was told there had been three indignation meetings, at which it was insisted that this was a great invasion of the liberty of the subject. There were, as they all knew, in many parishes men whose only chance of becoming politicians and orators, and of obtaining vestry honours, lay in discovering some unknown grievance and in declaiming against the bloated, pampered, heartless aristocracy. But, he did not believe that when a man was rich enough to keep a horse, he necessarily became less regardful of the wants of the poor; and to endeavour to raise class against class in connection with this affair was manifestly preposterous. They read in ancient history of an equestrian order being opposed to the plebeian order; but happily in England any person with 10s. in his pocket and a little leisure might belong to the equestrian order and enjoy the ride. There was no real antagonism between riders and walkers. On the contrary, he maintained that they mutually promoted and assisted each other's amusement. Since riders had been admitted to Kensington Gardens a large number of persons had gone there to look at them. It was urged that the new regulation was a matter of exclusion, but surely that exclusion would be on the part of those who would refuse admission to the riders. The grounds ought to be open to the enjoyment of the public in the best and most agreeable way; and the burden of proof lay with those who wished to exclude the riding public. Again, it was said the picturesque character of the gardens was injured; but he appealed to any judge of picturesque effect whether, on the contrary, the presence of equestrians did not add considerably to the beauty of the scene. But the objection that was most pressed was the danger occasioned to children, nursery-maids, and ladies in crossing the ride on foot. He would be the last person to wish to gratify the riders if there were any ground for this apprehension, but the danger seemed to be rather imaginary, inasmuch as the children and nurses who were to be exposed to the risk of crossing the ride had at present to cross the omnibus and carriage roads before they could enter the gardens. Rotten Row was crossed by thousands of children every summer's day in passing from Belgravia to Hyde

Mr. Cowper

Park, and yet, as far as he knew, not a single accident had occurred in Rotten Row. If, however, the residents in the neighbourhood really believed in the existence of this danger, it might easily be obviated by erecting some light bridge by which children and their nurses might cross the space devoted to riders. He would rather like to see such a bridge, not because any child or nurse would ever go over it, but because it would stand as a monument of the visionary character of these apprehensions. It was true that there had been a memorial against the ride signed by 1,500 persons, but a counter memorial was also announced in its favour. He knew from casual intercourse and other means of information that large numbers of people who went into the gardens on foot were very thankful to have a dull portion of the grounds converted into an amusing scene, and he had heard persons say they used to take the trouble of going a mile and a half to see the riders, whereas they now had them brought close to them. It could not be denied that Englishmen and Englishwomen took pleasure in seeing equestrians, even when they did not ride themselves; and when the hon. and learned Gentleman disclaimed any desire on the part of the legal profession to share in this exercise, he was only sorry that that profession should have so degenerated. The Judges and the Bar used to ride on circuit and to Westminster Hall, and when the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice, made their appearance on horseback in Rotten Row, their equestrianism did no discredit to the profession of which they were distinguished ornaments. He had spoken of the lawyer and the medical man only as types of that large body of hardworking men whose health and general welfare were of the utmost importance to the community, and who were obliged to take their horse exercise either early in the morning or late in the afternoon in Hyde Park. He did not allude only to Members of that House, but to the mercantile and professional classes of the Metropolis generally; and if they could have the pleasure of seeing the beauty of Kensington Gardens, without injury to any other class, he thought it was his duty, if possible, to extend to them that advantage.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had no right to say that those who had made representations to him upon the subject of the new ride in Kensington Gardens were actuated by a desire for vestry renown. The deputation which waited upon the right hon. Gentleman was headed by the Recorder of the City of London; and the time for the signature of the memorial had been limited in order to anticipate, and, if possible, prevent any agitation out of doors. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman had made this alteration under the impression that it would excite no opposition, but, as it would undoubtedly do so, he trusted that his right hon. Friend would at once reconsider the decision at which he had arrived. Of all the miserable places which he ever saw, the ride, which was now a swamp, and in dry weather became so hard that no one could ride upon it, was the worst. It was altogether a mistake, and the sooner things were restored to their original condition the better.

THE PAPER DUTIES.

QUESTION.

MR. PULLER said, it might have escaped the attention of hon. Members that the notice which for some time past had been standing on the paper on the subject of the paper duties had yesterday been altered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer so as to propose a diminution of the Customs' duty on paper after the 16th of August, instead of their total abolition. For some years past the Customs' duty on paper had been 2½d. per lb., the object of its imposition being to compensate the home manufacturer for the Excise duty of 1½d. per lb., and the additional 5 per cent to which he was liable, as also for the expense to which he was put by the Excise regulations, and for the disadvantage under which he laboured in comparison with his foreign rivals through the restrictions placed by other countries on the export of rags. In France and Belgium the export of rags had been altogether prohibited, and in Germany, Holland, and other countries there had been a large duty of from 6s. to 9s. per cwt. In 1853 the subject was distinctly brought under the notice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who then contemplated an equalization between the Customs' duty and the Excise; but the paper manufacturers of this country made out a good case, and his proposal to reduce the Customs' duty was abandoned expressly on the ground that they would be exposed to an unfair competition if such a measure were adopted. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer this year proposed the total abolition of both the Excise and Customs' duties on paper, our manufacturers were again thrown into consternation. The Foreign Secretary had intimated that the Government would use their best endeavours to induce other States to repeal or modify their restrictions on the exportation of the raw material, and on a subsequent evening the House had listened with pleasure to the announcement made by the noble Lord that the French Government had consented to substitute for their previous system of prohibition a small export duty on rags. The home manufacturers thought, when the House of Lords rejected the Bill for the repeal of the Excise duty, that the proposal to deal with the Customs' duty on paper would be abandoned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But they had now been undeceived, because the right hon. Gentleman had given notice of a Motion to reduce the Customs' duty to such an amount as would exactly compensate the English manufacturer for the Excise duty, and for the expense occasioned by the Excise regulations, but would not leave him any protection at all in respect of the existing restrictions on the export of the raw material from other countries. Under these circumstances he begged to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government has succeeded in obtaining from any of the Continental Governments the abolition or modification of the taxes or restrictions imposed by them on the export of Rags; whether it be true that the French Government has abandoned its project of substituting a Duty on the export of Rags for the prohibition which now exists; and, whether any Communication has been received from the French Government, claiming that, under the recent Treaty of Commerce, the Customs' Duty on French Paper imported into this country be diminished?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: With regard to the first question, I certainly did undertake, as the hon. Gentleman has stated, to represent to foreign Governments that it would be the desire of Her Majesty's Government that some change should be made with regard to the export of rags, that where there was a prohibition it should be abolished, and that where there was an export duty that duty should be reduced. I am sorry to say that those representations have not been successful; that, although some of the foreign Governments promised to consider the matter, no efficient steps have been taken for that purpose, and that many Governments replied that the paper manufacturers objected to any diminution of duty or removal of prohibition. That is the answer which we have received from Austria, Prussia, and from other Powers. With regard to the second question of the hon. Gentleman, I stated some time ago that the French Government proposed to change their system of prohibition into one of duty, and accordingly they submitted to the legislative body a project for such an alteration. We have no official information upon the subject, but we understand that great opposition was made to that project, and there are great doubts whether it will be carried. It therefore does not appear at all certain that the French Government will persist in the proposition. With reference to the last question, I imagine that, the treaty of commerce having been sanctioned by Parliament, the French Government will expect that our obligations in that respect should be fulfilled. They have made no communication upon the subject, but I imagine that they consider that, as a matter of course, we shall comply with the obligations of the treaty.

THE PRINTING OF THE BIBLE. QUESTION.

MR. BAINES rose to ask the Home Secretary, what course the Government intended to pursue as to the Queen's Printers' patent for printing the Bible. The House was aware that a Select Committee sat during the last Session and the present, to inquire into this subject; and in their Report they made the following recommendation, namely,— "That the Patent of the Queen's Printers, so far as relates to the printing of Bibles and New Testaments be not renewed, and that no exclusive privilege of printing the Sacred Volume be allowed henceforth to exist."

As Chairman of the Committee, he thought it his duty to give his right hon. Friend (Sir George Lewis), the opportunity of informing the House and the public the course which he intended to take on this matter. It was not his (Mr. Baines') intention to discuss the general question on its merits, owing to the advanced stage of the Session; but there were one or two points to which he must draw the attention of the Home Secretary and the House. Whilst the Committee was yet sitting—as the former patent of the Queen's Printers expired in January, 1860—the right hon. Gentleman renewed the patent, not for any term of years, but during the Queen's pleasure. But if that patent should not be revoked by an Act of the Government, the recommendation of the Select Committee would be set aside, and the exclusive privilege of printing the Bible enjoyed by the Queen's Printers and the Universities would be continued. Now, there were on the face of the patent two great anomalies. It was in the old form, and had the vices of centuries on its head. The patent, in the first place, strictly forbade any other person than the Queen's Printers to print the Bible in England, "of any translation, with notes, or without notes;" and in the second place, it forbade the introduction into or sale in England of any Bibles printed out of England; which of course prohibited the introduction of Bibles printed in Scotland, where the printing had been free for twenty years, though under the supervision of a Bible Board. Now, the English printers were subjected to a real and twofold injustice, and the Scotch only to an apparent injustice; the two kinds of injustice being partially cured by two modes of violating the law. The patentees did not venture to enforce their rights as to the printing of the Bible with notes in England, or as to the importation of Bibles from Scotland. The Scotch printers introduced their Bibles, which were sold as freely in London as in Edinburgh or Glasgow. But the English printers were prevented from printing the authorized version without note or comment—thus losing the privilege of printing the book which was more largely sold than any other book in the world, and although they printed editions of the Bible with notes, yet, in so doing, they were subjected to the payment of the paper duty, from which the Queen's Printers, the Universities, and the Scotch printers were exempted. Therefore, the English printers had to bear an unjust competition with the Scotch printers. In order to show how severely this pressed upon them he would state that he had within these few days presented to the Lords of the Treasury a memorial from the enterprising firm of Messrs John Cassell and Co., of London, in which they said that they were issuing an illustrated Family Bible, for which they had had a sale of nearly 200,000 copies, but "that the paper tax upon this issue amounted to a sum of more than £3,000 per annum, which is substantially a tax to that amount upon the free circulation of the Bible among the classes for whom it is most desirable to provide religious instruction." He did not comment upon these facts, but he thought it right to mention them, and to ask the Government and the House to consider whether the law ought to be left in such a state as to be constantly violated. If unhappily the Government should be so inconsistent with its free-trade policy as to uphold the patent, he should next Session invite the attention of the House to the subject, in the hope that the Parliament which had abolished the customs duties on 400 articles, and thrown open every trade for the supply of every want of the people, would abolish the last and worst monopoly, that of printing the Word of God, and give us that perfect freedom of competition which the experience of all ages and countries showed to be the surest guarantee for cheapness and excellence.

Lord John Russell

MR. DUNLOP said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Government to maintain to the Queen's Printers the power renewed by the Patent lately granted of preventing the importation into England of Bibles printed elsewhere, and, in particular, of copies of the authorized version of the Scriptures printed in Scotland, by licence, and under the revision of Her Majesty's Bible Board of Scotland?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, if he had taken advantage of the reappointment of the Select Committee on the printing of the Bible to amend the patent he should have exposed himself to the charge of want of good faith. The hon. Member for Leeds would probably have said that he had met his argument against the patent by altering it, and therefore he had taken care to renew it exactly in its existing form. His own opinion was that, looking to the extreme cheapness of the editions of the Bible and of the Common Prayer Book published in this country, and the great variety of forms in which they were issued, the Bible and Prayer Book were, in fact, published as cheaply under the present system as they would be if the printing were thrown open to public competition. He objected to the expression "monopoly," used by the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines), because practically there was a very active competition with respect to the printing of the Bible and the Book of Common Prayer between the Queen's Printer and the two Universities; and every one was aware that the most determined competition might prevail among a very limited number of individuals or of corporate bodies. He believed it was impossible that the Bible could be printed more cheaply than it was printed at present; and there seemed to be a general persuasion in the public mind that it ought not to be printed without some public control and supervision. In Scotland, where it was said the printing of the Bible was free, not a single sheet could be published until it was sanctioned by the Bible Board. A certain expense was involved in the maintenance of that Board, which was paid by the public money; but in England the necessity of paid officers was avoided by the contrivance, which appeared both effectual and economical, of limiting the right of printing the Bible to the two Universities and the Queen's Printer. With respect to the importation of Bibles printed in Scotland, and with respect to the printing of Bibles with notes or illustrations, or in foreign languages, no practical inconvenience existed. The exclusive right exercised by the Queen's Printer and the two Universities was practically limited to the printing of the authorized version without note or comment, and the importation of Bibles from Scotland was perfectly free, there being agencies in London, who kept by them a large supply of Bibles and Prayer Books printed in Scotland. The hon. Gentleman said that this was a violation of the law; but it was not, properly speaking, a violation of the law, but a violation of the Queen's Printer's patent, and, of course, if he chose to waive his right, he had a right to do so. He was not aware of any practical inconvenience in the present state of things; but, if any should be felt, he should be ready to issue an Amendment of the patent. With regard to the Universities, he believed that what was desired could be effected without legislation; but neither the Queen's Printer nor the Universities desired to exercise those rights, which had not been exercised for many years.

PARTY BANNERS IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. COGAN said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government have received information that, from the 1st to the 12th of July, Orange Flags have been flying from the towers and steeples of a great number of churches in the North of Ireland; and, if so, whether Government intend to propose any legislative enactment to further restrain the public exhibition of Party Banners and Flags in Ireland; and to call the attention of the House to the state of the North of Ireland? It was with much pain that, thirty years after Catholic Emancipation, he felt compelled to draw the attention of the House to atrocities springing from religious fanaticism in the North of Ireland, which could not be equalled in any country in Europe, and were only paralleled by those dreadful events now taking place in Syria. He (Mr. Cogan) had already given notice that he would introduce a Bill to prohibit these irritating displays; but he believed he could show to the House that a necessity existed for such an enactment, which he hoped would induce the Government to take up the matter themselves as it was clearly impossible for a private Member at that period of the Session to be able to carry any such measure. The hon. Member for Armagh (Sir William Verner), the deputy grand master of the Orange Society in Ireland, was last night understood to give his assent to the introduction of some measure to put an end to the public exhibition of party emblems in Ireland; and, doubtless, animated by humane feelings, shocked at the recent outrages, had thus intimated that the exhibition of party banners in Ireland could not but be attended with danger to the public peace. While giving him every credit for so acting, he felt bound to declare, at the same time, that he believed that a deep responsibility rested on the hon. Member and others of station and property in the North of Ireland for assisting to prolong the existence of the Orange Society, by giving the authority of their names and influence to it. He believed he need not then enter into any lengthened argument for the purpose of showing that that society had been productive of considerable mischief in Ireland. So far back as the year 1813 it had been condemned by Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning. It had since that time frequently occupied the attention of the House, and in the year 1832 its proceedings had rendered necessary the Party Processions Act, which had been introduced by the present Earl of Derby, who was severely attacked by Mr. Shaw for saying that the Orangemen of Ireland alone persisted in keeping up religious animosities, and that their only object in meeting was to insult their Catholic fellow subjects and to defy the Government; also the late Mr. O'Connell, who for many years indulged the vain hope of conciliating the Orange party, and others, strongly opposed the measure as an infringement of the constitutional liberties of the people, and alleged that the Emancipation Act would put an end to the atrocities against which it was directed. Outrage followed outrage, however, in the North of Ireland, and they were doomed to see similar disastrous events as those that occurred in 1840. In 1845 Parliament thought they would give a chance to the Orangemen in Ireland, and they allowed the Act to expire. It was not until other outrages occurred that the attention of Parliament was again awakened to the subject, and all those who, in 1832, were opposed to it were reluctantly compelled to admit that the exceptional circumstances of the North of Ireland rendered its re-enactment a matter of necessity. In 1850, then, the Act was revived by the unanimous vote of the House, including even the hon. Members from the North of Ireland who were Members of the Society. Still the conduct of the Orange body looked so dangerous to the peace and tranquillity of the country as to demand the serious attention of Parliament. A Committee was appointed to inquire into the whole subject, and the result was, three Reports in which it was declared that the existence of the Orange Society was dangerous to the peace and prosperity of the country. Addresses were presented to the Throne by both Houses calling for the suppression of the society. Gentlemen connected with the North of Ireland and in high position, both in this and the other House of Parliament, declared their compliance with the wish expressed by their Sovereign that the body should be dissolved. Again a hope was entertained that a feeling of brotherly love would be established in the country, and that the insults of an old religious ascendancy which had passed away would be abandoned. He regretted to say, however, that again they were disappointed. Men of great influence and ability, and deserving of great respect, yet carried away by religious prejudices, again sought to revive the Orange Society. Lawyers were consulted to advise how or by what means the law could be evaded. The right hon. Joseph Napier, the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland, drew up a code of laws in 1845 for the revival of the Orange Society. He (Mr.

Mr. Cogan

Cogan) did not mean to implicate Mr. Napier with the Orange Society by his doing so. That learned Gentleman, who had been a distinguished and esteemed Member of that House, merely acted on that occasion in his capacity as an eminent lawyer; but he regretted that he did not use his great influence with his party for the purpose of suppressing a body that had done such great mischief. In May, 1849, the Orange Society was again revived, and in July, 1849, just two months afterwards, the dreadful massacre of Dolly's Brae, with the details of which the House was no doubt familiar, took place. The Earl of Derby, in speaking of that affair, in which a village was burned down and many lives lost—condemned in as strong language as possible the atrocities of the Orange party. On a recent occasion unfortunately they had seen all that bad feeling spring again into existence at the unfortunate meeting of Derrymacash, where a number of persons were fired upon by the Orange party. Although he was pleased to hear that the Government intended to frame a provision to check such disturbances by preventing the exhibition of Orange flags and banners upon churches and other places, still the organization of which this outbreak was the outward sign would remain. Until that organization was destroyed, there could be no hope of the permanent re-establishment of peace in Ireland. Now it was in the power of Parliament to destroy that organization. If the law were vigorously put in force, and no magistrate and no Lord or Deputy Lieutenant were allowed to belong to these exclusive and secret societies—and he was ready to prove, if it were considered necessary, from the Report on the Belfast riots, that they were both exclusive and secret—the Government would at once go to the root of the evil. If, however, they were not prepared to take such a step, he would appeal to the good feeling of the gentlemen in the North of Ireland whether there was any practical use in this organization, and whether it did not create more mischief than good. What could be a stronger proof of its dangerous character than the letter which the gallant Member for Armagh had lately penned with such good taste, and calling upon the Orangemen to abstain from those riots which usually took place on the 1st and 12th of July of every year? Other measures also should be taken. The Government, for instance, might direct their attention to the jury system in Ireland, with a view of rendering it impossible for Orange juries to try Orange offenders. At present, as Judge Fletcher stated, Catholics in the North of Ireland had no assurance that justice would be done to them when they or when Orangemen were brought for trial before an Orange jury. On one occasion Chief Justice Bushe said, after the acquittal of an Orangeman in the county of Down, "That is your verdict, gentlemen; thank God it is not mine!" Moreover, there could be no proper faith in the administration of justice when Members of the Orange Society were on the bench. No man should be retained in the commission of the peace, or should be allowed to sit on a jury, who belonged to this or to any other secret society, whether they were orange or green. He (Mr. Cogan) would put down both the one and the other; he believed they were the great curse of the country, and at the root of all its evils. He did not wish to speak with harshness of those clergymen who allowed their churches to be decorated with Orange flags and banners when they knew they were calculated to insult and arouse the angry passions of a large portion of their fellow countrymen; he believed many of them were compelled to do so against their will. He should only say that he regarded such a mode of church decorations as a desecration of the house of God, who preached peace and good will to men. Upon a church adjoining the court in Lurgan, where an investigation about the shooting down of sixteen Catholics by the Orange procession at Derrymacash was going on, there were to be seen, long after the 12th of July, four Orange flags flaunting in the breeze. Was not that a desecration of the house of God? Few Gentlemen in that House were aware of the length to which these things were carried in the North of Ireland. There at all times Catholics were exposed to annoyance and insult, "To Hell with the Pope" being a common street cry, which was shouted in the streets at all times. Very recently a Catholic gentleman was chosen sheriff of the county of Fermanagh. He was a man universally respected and esteemed, but he was prevented from dining with the grand jury, because the standing toast was an insult to his religion, it being the "Glorious, pious, and immortal memory." Would or should such a thing be longer tolerated! He (Mr. Cogan) would not object in England to drink the health of William III., whom he considered to have introduced many reforms; but in Ireland that toast was intended as an insult to Catholics, and as such was distasteful to them; in the one country his name was identified with civil and religious liberty, but in the other it was connected with the most shameful religious persecution and penal laws—and was intended to mean Protestant ascendancy. Sir Robert Peel long ago condemned the practice of observing anniversaries, which were made the occasions of disorder, and why did the Protestant gentlemen of Ireland to this day encourage and permit such baneful practices to continue? Sir Robert Peel had said that that toast was meant to commemorate the battle of the Boyne, and to celebrate the defeat of the Roman Catholics. Mr. Lefroy, the present Lord Chief Justice in Ireland, who was then a Member of that House, said they might as well declare that the battle of Waterloo should no longer be commemorated. Well, they had lived to see the day when, in deference to the feelings of their French Ally, that great event was no longer commemorated; and were the feelings of their own fellow-subjects to be still disregarded? He would only remind the House that in 1857 Belfast was for days the scene of almost civil war, one class of citizens being arrayed in arms against another class. Commissioners were appointed to inquire into the causes of the outbreak, and they reported that the observance of the July anniversary was the main cause of all the disorders. He would not enter at any length into the details of the recent outrage. A riot was provoked by the insulting and irritating conduct of the Orange party. On the morning of the 12th upwards of 5,000 Orangemen with 28 drums and fifes were marching through Lurgan, it being market day—and on the return of some of these in the evening some one of them fired a pistol at the cross on the chapel at Derrymacash—so it began. It is not material who actually commenced the riot, but it was certain that the Orange party alone indulged in firing. Sixteen persons were wounded, two of them dangerously, and the persons who were responsible for that were those who encouraged or took part in such irritating proceedings. One part of the evil was to be dealt with, but he wished to see the Orange Society entirely abolished; he believed there would be no peace in the North of Ireland till that was done. He wished hon. Gentlemen would exert themselves to that end, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks would persuade his followers to abandon and discourage the society, he would probably obtain a larger number of supporters; for in Ireland the chief ground of objection to a Conservative Government was, that its entering into office was regarded as the signal for a renewal of insults to the Catholics and the assertion of Protestant ascendancy. They had been offended and outraged by some who now sat on the Treasury bench, but they still supported them, because they disliked more the advent of a Government which would lead to Orange ascendancy. They had not forgiven the Durham letter, and never could forgive it; and there were many other things which the Whigs had done not to be forgotten, and if the right hon. Gentlemen opposite were wise, they would take advantage of this, and bid for power in Ireland. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary for Ireland would take warning by this. If he could be instrumental in putting down these party organizations, which had been productive of so much mischief, and could bring all the people of Ireland, of whatever creed or party, to live together as fellow-citizens of one country, he would deserve the gratitude of Ireland.

Mr. Cogan

MR. DAWSON said, he had listened with great attention and deep interest to the observations of the hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Cogan), in which the hon. Member had alluded to a series of events which were greatly to be deplored by every Member of the House. He (Mr. Dawson) was deeply interested in the good name and the prosperity of Ireland, and especially the North of Ireland; and no one could deprecate more than he those useless and insulting displays which invariably accompanied these July anniversaries. He had seen many of these manifestations, but they had always grated on his feelings, because he was aware that they recalled party triumphs which ought to be forgotten, and prefigured the establishment of ascendancy which he never desired to see exercised by any class. So far he agreed with the hon. Member for Kildare in the very able statement which he had made, but he would ask the House not to continue the discussion of an irritating matter, or to use any partisan expression which might tend to widen differences already existing in certain districts in Ireland. He must remind the House that the excitement was confined to certain localities, and did not prevail throughout the whole of Ulster; but leading articles, written on the telegraphic reports of proceedings in the House, frequently appeared in Irish newspapers, and therefore he would suggest to hon. Members to refrain from any language which would afford ground for articles that would not lead to that good feeling which he was sure it was the wish of the House to promote. He was well acquainted with the town of Lurgan, and he was able to corroborate the statement of the hon. Member that the magistrates had used their utmost exertions to bring the offenders in this matter to justice. He had that morning received a letter from Lord Lurgan, which stated that the magistrates were unanimously determined to sift this deplorable case to the bottom, and that they would spare no pains for the purpose. It was almost unnecessary to say that he had never been a member of an Orange body. Nobody regretted their existence more than he did, and he had always been of opinion that secret societies, of whatever party, had been the curse of Ireland. If the efforts of the local magistracy were seconded by the Government, there was every reason to believe that tranquillity and a spirit of confidence would soon be restored.

MR. CARDWELL said, he thought that after the able and dispassionate statement of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kildare, and the candid speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, it would be better on the whole that the discussion on this subject should not be protracted. He believed that, whatever party was in power, such occurrences as these would be viewed with the deepest regret by the Government, and every Government would view with the liveliest satisfaction the dissolution of the societies which led to such occurrences, and which postponed the day when the people of Ireland would live together as one united and loyal people. Last year he had the pleasure of stating that these anniversaries passed over in the most satisfactory manner, and there was every reason to hope that such would be the case this year. Unhappily, there had occurred riots in Armagh at the beginning of the month. It led to forty-five persons making their appearance at the assizes, and now there was this disturbance. The main cause of these disturbances was a social condition which it was their duty to remove, as far as possible, by social and moral means; but there were also defects in the law which the Government intended to ask Parliament to remedy at once, notwithstanding the short period which remained of the present Session. He might mention, in answer to a question which had been put to him, that the town of Belfast was under proclamation at the time referred to, and still remained in the same condition. The town of Lurgan would be put under proclamation immediately. The defective state of the law had already attracted the attention of Government, but he was glad that their attention had been so early called to it by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir William Verner). Nothing could exceed the exertions which had been made by the magistrates of Lurgan, but, as their investigation had not yet terminated and he had no official information, therefore, on the subject, it would be right for him to abstain from further dwelling on it. He drew, however, a very favourable augury for the future from the temperate, but forcible observations which had fallen from Gentlemen on both sides of the House. They could not be lost on any part of the community, and he trusted that the generous sentiments which had been elicited by the discussion on these occurrences when conveyed to Ireland would strengthen the efforts which would be made by the Government, not only to put down these disturbances, but to remove the causes of them.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that though the statement of the hon. Member for Kildare was, in some respects, a proper one, he (Mr. Whiteside) must take issue with him on the picture which he had drawn of the province of Ulster. He said that, to his (Mr. Cogan's) knowledge, justice had not been done by Judges and by juries acting in that part of Ireland. He (Mr. Whiteside) begged to tell the hon. Gentleman that he had been present at many trials in Ulster, at which, without an instant's hesitation, juries brought in a verdict against men for having walked in procession. He had seen one man sent to gaol there for six months for whistling a party tune. It was monstrous to say that the Judges of the land—most of whom were of the same religious persuasion as the hon. Member himself—would not administer the law impartially.

MR. COGAN in explanation said, that he had made no allusion to the Judges of the land. What he had said was, that it must be injurious to the administration of justice to have men administering the law who were members of an Orange Society.

MR. WHITESIDE: The hon. Gentleman had asked a very sensible question as to what had led to the reconstruction of the Orange Society. He (Mr. Whiteside) would answer the question for him, although no one could answer it better than the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. It was as well the whole truth should be spoken. After the dissolution of the Orange Societies Mr. O'Connell commenced the greatest agitation which was ever seen in any country in the world. It appeared that the Orange party at Lurgan, on the occasion referred to, consisted of a number of people, 500 in all, men, women and children, who had gone to church—and he supposed he must regret that they had done so if it gave offence—and who were returning. It was not such numbers Mr. O'Connell brought together. When he was engaged in revolutionizing Ireland, he brought together hundreds of thousands of strong men, and, as he believed, brave men. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) was then Secretary for Ireland, and he directed a prosecution against Mr. O'Connell for those meetings and societies, which were very unlike the small affair at Lurgan, because they were well organized by a man of consummate ability as an agitator, and their avowed object was to change the Government of the country. It was a legitimate object in which Garibaldi had succeeded elsewhere. Mr. O'Connell did not admire English administration, and he wished to get rid of it if he could. It was exactly at that time that a body of persons of opposite opinions held meetings and drew up resolutions for the express purpose—it might have been wrong, but for the express purpose of disputing with Mr. O'Connell the possession of the country. That was the short history of the resuscitation of these societies. No one had laboured more in the good and wise attempt to repress the excesses of any body of politicians than Lord Eglinton. There were disturbances at Belfast, but 100 constables were sent down, and on the first occasion of a riot afterwards, they caught the rioters. The rioters were sent to gaol for a month, and they heard no more of riots at Belfast. He was not satisfied with the conduct of the officials on that occasion. If there were any procession which was forbidden by the law, how came it to pass that it was permitted to proceed? He doubted very much whether there was any procession; but, if there were, all the persons were engaged in an illegal act, and the process of detection was very simple, because it took place in broad day-light. These persons went to church. They left it, and he was told that a man's treading on a match was mistaken for the shot of a pistol. The firing at a cross was a very unlikely thing to take place, and he had heard with great pleasure that it was a fiction, and that nothing of the kind had occurred. What did occur, he was informed, was more natural. A shower of stones came from behind hedges and ditches as these people were proceeding home. He understood that they had no arms, and not even sticks; but, being naturally pugnacious they retired, and got into some house where there were arms. They returned, and, though in a great minority, forced a passage home. It was a very lamentable transaction, and, no matter who were right or who were wrong, he hoped all would be punished. If there were any illegal procession, there was law enough to punish them. But a riot in one corner of Ulster did not justify the description which had been given of a province nearly as large as Scotland. There was no part of Ireland where the Roman Catholics were more comfortable or were better paid, and he trusted they would live happily with those who differed from them; one mode to accomplish which was to repress those feelings to which the hon. Gentleman had directed his observations. It would be far better, in this instance, to have allowed these persons to go home, to have marked them, to have given information, and to have prosecuted them for the procession, if it were an illegal procession. He was very sorry that the transaction had occurred; but, he was sure, there was no spot in Her Majesty's dominions where justice was more efficiently administered than in that part of Ireland.

Mr. Whiteside

SIR WILLIAM VERNER said, the hon. Member for Kildare had endeavoured to make this impression on the House—that the only persons guilty of any outrages in Ireland were those whom the hon. Gentleman might call Orangemen if he liked, but who were the Protestants of Ireland, for it was against them as a body, and not against the Orange Society only, that the objection lay. He asked the hon. Member could he produce a single instance in which the Protestants had ever shot a person in broad daylight, in presence of hundreds of people, without one of them being found to come forward and give evidence against the murderer? The House was not fully aware of the nature of the society which had caused the remodelling and reforming of the Orange body. He meant the Ribbon Society. He would state a case to show what this society was. A gentleman who succeeded to a property in the North of Ireland appointed an agent to take charge of it. The agent went upon the property, and one of the first things he endeavoured to do was to establish a school. The schoolmaster was a Protestant, and in open daylight a party went to his house, dragged him out, and murdered him in presence of his two daughters, in front of his house. The murderer was taken with his coat covered with blood; the daughters identified him as engaged on the occasion, so that there could be no mistake. He was brought to trial in Armagh; and on two several occasions the jury disagreed and there was no verdict. This was stated to be owing to the presence of Ribbonmen on the juries; for by one of the oaths of the Ribbon Society the members bound themselves to on no account give evidence against a brother Ribbonman, no matter what the offence. The man was brought to trial a third time, the prosecutor having taken especial care to exclude Ribbonmen from the jury. The consequence was that the prisoner was found guilty and hung. In 1848, when Ireland was very disturbed, and the troops were obliged to be sent out of Dublin, the Lord Lieutenant could not find 200 men to depend upon without having recourse to the Orangemen. He accepted the services of 200 of them, and placed arms in their hands.

CEYLON RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM GALLWEY said, he had a notice on the paper to put certain questions to the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, regarding the Ceylon Railway; and he wished to express a hope that some statement would be made that might tend to tranquillize the minds of the colonists in that Island, who were excessively disturbed at the prospect of an enormous railway expenditure which threatened them; and that some measure would be suggested, if possible, to extricate them from the position in which they found themselves; very much owing to the mismanagement of the Colonial Office. He would say a very few words as to the origin, progress, and present state of the Ceylon Railway. In 1856 the Governor in Council passed what was technically called an ordinance for reviving the Ceylon Railway Company, and calling on the Island to grant the sum of £1,200,000 to complete it. The decision of the Governor and of the Legislative Council was received in the Island with the greatest consternation. It was alleged that was not the result of a free expression of opinion on the part of the Representatives of the Island in the Legislative Council. The Council consisted of eighteen Members, eight of whom were official persons, on whom the Government could bring influence to bear; and the ordinance was carried by a majority of only one. The matter was referred home, and the Secretary for the Colonies was called upon to send out a competent engineer; and if he decided that the line could be made for £1,200,000, that then the Colonial Office should make arrangements with a Company to carry it out for that sum. The Colonial Secretary sent out Captain Moorson; but unfortunately, as he was informed by that gentleman, with no instructions to make a working survey. Captain Moorson made what was called a "flying survey," and declared that the line could be made for that sum; and by that course the agreement became an absolute one, and the colonists found themselves pledged not to make a railway for a definite sum, but pledged to a company to pay six per cent on an indefinite sum. The Company caused their own engineer to make another survey, when, to the horror of the colonists, he reported that the railway could not be made for a less sum than £2,250,000. When he stated to the House that this would entail an addition to the export duty on coffee of from 2½ to about 8 per cent, they would see that the consternation of the colonists was very natural. It might be said that Sir Henry Ward's somewhat rash conduct in regard to this railway was confirmed by subsequent addresses from the colonists. But at the time of the great railway excitement in Ceylon, there was a Cambridge house in Colombo, and he was told that the festivities held there produced these addresses in support of the Governor's proceedings. The railway had also been negligent and extravagant in carrying on its works; and he appealed to the hon. Baronet, the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), who was connected with the direction of the Company, to afford some explanation of its conduct. When the colonists referred to the Home Government for a complete survey, and an agreement defining the sum they were to pay, they also expressed a strong desire to have some gentleman possessing the confidence of the Island, and well acquainted with the locality through which the line was to pass, appointed on the direction of the railway to take care of their interests. To their great surprise and extreme disgust, however, instead of their request being complied with, they found the Government sending out a précis clerk from the Colonial Office to undertake that duty. He wished, therefore, to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies to suspend all expenditure on the Ceylon Railway, except such as is absolutely necessary for the preservation of works in progress; to inquire, in the event of the connection between the Railway Company and the colony being severed, whether the Government will submit to a strict audit all claims for repayment made by the Ceylon Railway Company; and whether the recent expenditure on surveys (swelling the sums expended under this head to above £100,000) was undertaken by the desire, or with the knowledge, of the Colonial Legislature?

MR. P. W. MARTIN asked what reason there could be for expending £2,000,000 upon an undertaking which a responsible English contractor was prepared to complete for a much smaller sum?

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that the House was not the proper place for discussing railway politics. The general meeting of the Ceylon Railway Company would be held next week, when he believed explanations would be given which would be satisfactory to the public in regard to the position of the undertaking. The cost of the surveys for the line was £39,000, not £100,000, as had been stated.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he must protest against the assumption that this railway project, though unfortunately not now in a flourishing position, had been in any degree forced upon the people of Ceylon by the Colonial Department. The Government had been repeatedly urged by the colonists to promote the making of a line between Kandy and the port of Colombo; and on their application Lord Taunton, when at the Colonial Office, entered into a provisional agreement with the Ceylon Railway Company. It was true that the provisional agreement was sanctioned only by a majority of one in the Legislative Council of Ceylon; but the Governor made its adoption an open question in the Council, and it was strongly opposed by the then Colonial Secretary, and present Governor of Ceylon. After Captain Moorsom's report was received, stating that the project might be carried out much within the limit of £1,200,000, the feeling of the colonists generally was decidedly favourable to the undertaking. The hon. Member was very naturally disappointed at what had since happened; but there had certainly been nothing approaching to a wish on the part of the Home authorities to force this project on a reluctant community. Some months ago his noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Office consulted the late eminent, Mr. Stephenson upon the subject of this railway, and by his advice suspended all works upon the line, with very few exceptions. At the same time he ordered home Mr. Doyne, the resident engineer, and sent out the agents of two eminent contracting firms, in order that materials might be prepared for offering a contract. Since then the whole matter had been submitted to Mr. Hawkshaw, who recommended that the railway should be proceeded with at an estimated cost of £1,800,000. Certain offers for the surrender of the contract had been made by the company to the Colonial Office, and these, together with all the circumstances of the case, would be submitted to the Legislative Council, and to those commercial bodies which were entitled to be consulted in the matter, before any decision was arrived at. He apprehended that no such offer would be accepted without a thorough investigation of the affairs of the company. That statement nearly amounted to an answer to the second question of the hon. Baronet. With respect to the third question, he begged also to say that nothing would be done without consulting the wishes of the colony.

Sir William Gallwey

MR. BUCHANAN complained that, although this railway had not been made, the planters had for some time been subjected to an additional export duty on their produce on its account.

MR. DUDLEY FORTESCUE said, that as one of the ill-used planters referred to, he thought that the complaints which had been just made were well founded.

Motion agreed to. House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CARDWELL said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill. When the Maynooth Act was introduced in 1845 a provision was contemplated by the Government and Parliament with respect to the annual repairs of the college. It was proposed, according to the statement of Sir Robert Peel, that the Board of Works should undertake the repairs of the college, in order that the business should be conducted with the greatest economy, and that the cost should be included in the annual estimates of the Board. Accordingly, in the Act itself the Board of Works were made Commissioners for the purpose, among others, of enlarging, improving, repairing, and furnishing from time to time the buildings constituting the College of Maynooth. That arrangement continued until 1851, which was the last year in which Parliament voted any sum of money for repairs at Maynooth. There was in the Treasury a balance which served the purpose in 1852. In 1853 the Government included in the estimate for the Board of Works the usual sum for the repairs of the college, but on the Motion of the hon. Member for Warwickshire, that Vote was rejected by a small majority, and no Vote had since been taken for Maynooth. Last year a memorial, praying that the annual Vote should be renewed, was presented to the Irish Government by the authorities of the college. The answer he returned was that it was then too late to consider the subject, and that even with regard to future years he could hold out no expectation that the Government would think it expedient to propose an annual Vote to Parliament. When the trustees of the college held their annual meeting in the present year he directed their attention to the Report of the Harrowby Commission, in which were set forth all the wants which the building now had in order to fit it for the purposes for which it was intended by Parliament. All the money originally appropriated had been expended, but the works were still in an unfinished state, and he could not understand the policy, when we had spent a large sum of money in erecting a building for the education of a number of men who were to be in an important degree the guides of the Irish population, of keeping those persons in a position of discomfort. If the building was not to be allowed to fall to pieces, money from some source must be found. It was hopeless to think of an annual Vote; but the Harrowby Commission had recommended a different arrangement, and the trustees of the college had informed him that, while they could not relinquish their claim to a Vote of Parliament for annual repairs, they felt themselves constrained under present circumstances to accept any reasonable expedient by which the building might be saved from falling to decay, and the health and comfort of its inmates might be secured. Having received that communication, he thought it right immediately to ask the permission of the House to give effect to that arrangement. It was proposed to deal with the sum of £5,000 a year as mentioned in the last paragraph of the Report. That amount was by the Maynooth Act assigned in sums of £20 each to 250 senior students, and the Commissioners recommended that the fund for repairs should be obtained by suspending those payments. Then came the question, how was the amount to be applied? For the annual repairs the whole sum would be more than sufficient, but the whole sum was not immediately available, as the trustees would not suspend the allowances to any of those pupils to whom they were already given. Their interests would continue to be preserved, and it was only by the suspension of the allowances to new pupils that funds could be obtained. At the same time it would not be right to suspend the allowances with respect to the whole of the new students, as it was necessary to afford some encouragement to merit in any scholastic institution. At any rate, the whole sum would not be available for some period. The application of the money would not be limited to mere repairs, but the chapel—a necessary building in any scholastic institution—would be finished, and care would be taken to provide proper ventilation, lighting by gas, and baths. To meet this expense it was proposed to allow, with the previous sanction of the Treasury, the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, who had a sum of money in their hands similar to that which the Exchequer Loan Commissioners dispensed, to make advances to complete the college and keep it in repair, on the credit of the sum of £5,000 a year. It was not intended to make any addition to the college directly or indirectly, but simply to complete it and repair that which would otherwise fall to ruin. He was sorry that the hon. Member for Warwickshire intended to offer opposition to the Bill, and he should have thought that the hon. Member, having great objection to the endowments of the pupils of the college, would have supported the Bill, which drew on those endowments for the repairs of the college. The House must either permit a building erected at great expense to fall to ruin—a result which would have most important consequences of a moral and political character—or, since it would not appropriate funds for the repair of the building, it must consent to the present Bill, which trespassed on the funds assigned to the students.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. SPOONER said, he rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. As the House was aware, he dissented altogether to the institution, as he thought it was contrary to the Protestant constitution of this country to do anything in support of a system of education completely subversive of the Protestant religion. He would not enter into details on the present occasion, his general views having been so often stated in respect to a perpetual charge on the Consolidated Fund for Maynooth. He objected to the Bill on two grounds. First, that it enabled the Government to apply grants of public money to the extension of the College of Maynooth, and secondly, that it entailed the cost of the annual repairs of the college upon the country. Ever since 1853 the House had declared that they would have nothing to do with the repairs, and they took away the powers of the Commissioners, not because they grudged the money, but because they thought it an object to which the sanction of Parliament ought not to be given. But he had still stronger objections to the second clause, by which the trustees and Commissioners were authorized to borrow and lend money for that purpose. The moment that was done the country was responsible for the payment of the loan. The House was in reality now asked to give perpetuity to the grant. It was nothing more nor less than paying money in perpetuity for that to which he was conscientiously opposed. He felt no enmity against the Roman Catholics. They ought to enjoy their civil rights, but he did object to any assistance being given by a Protestant Parliament to the propagation of the Roman Catholic religion. The doctrines taught in that college were completely subversive of the articles of our pure Reformed Church, which articles the Sovereign of this country was bound by the Coronation Oath to maintain. These doctrines were, moreover, contrary to the Word of God, and such as a Protestant nation ought not to encourage. He believed that this country owed the great blessings which it had so long enjoyed to its Protestantism; and he believed further, that the judgment of Heaven would fall on us if we diverged from it. As long as he had a seat in the House he felt bound to express his conviction. He had another objection to the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had put a face upon the question it really did not bear. It was not to keep a public building in repair; it was not to make the pupils in the college comfortable that the Bill was proposed; it was to undo what Parliament had done in 1853, and, by a side-wind, to sanction a departure from what Parliament then had enacted, and to introduce a practice entirely contrary and opposed to our pure Protestant Constitution.

Mr. Cardwell

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day three months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR WILLIAM VERNER seconded the Amendment, which he believed would meet with the approbation of the country. He wished to know whether the funds which it was now proposed to apply might not be used for the purpose of extending the present buildings and increasing the number of pupils?

MR. WHALLEY said, he also objected to the Bill, not because the doctrines taught in the College were contrary to the Word of God—not because the object of the Bill might be to increase the number of Roman Catholic pupils in the College, but because the object was to remove the annual grants made to the College from the jurisdiction of Parliament. The 2nd clause enabled the trustees to borrow money on the security of the grant; and immediately that section was passed the grant, instead of being a subject of discussion year by year, whether it should be renewed or not, would be removed from the pale of discussion, for the money borrowed would be borrowed by authority of Parliament. The House had been by a recent Bill supported by the Government, called on to recognize the doctrine, discipline, laws, canons, and usages of the Roman Catholic Church. He had made some inquiry into those matters, and if any one was prepared to contend that the doctrines, discipline, laws, canons, and usages of the Roman Catholic Church were such as to entitle the college to further support, he for one was prepared to enter upon the discussion, if the promoters of the Bill were willing to submit the subject to such discussion; but if not, then this Bill — pretending to be for repairing the buildings of Maynooth, but being really for the purpose of changing altogether the nature of the existing grant by removing it beyond the ordinary control of that House, and thereby preventing future discussion of the doctrines, discipline, laws, canons, and usages there taught and used—ought to be rejected.

MR. GEORGE said, he should support the second reading. He believed that the principle of the Bill was not that there should be a shilling added to the grant, but that there should be an authority to devote the surplus money already granted to the repairs of the building. Therefore he gave his assent to the second reading.

MR. BUTT said, he was not satisfied with the Bill, and could not consent to vote for it if it abrogated a pledge solemnly given by Parliament that there should not be an annual grant to Maynooth for the purpose of repairs. He thought that it did amount to a distinct pledge that the repairs should be defrayed by Parliament, and he hoped that when the Bill went through Committee words would be inserted which would leave open the important question of an annual grant.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, I wish to make a few remarks with regard to the position in which the House stands in reference to this Bill. I believe that I can show that the House is asked to stultify itself by agreeing to any such measure. In the first place, the Bill proposes that the same number of students shall be educated at Maynooth as were provided for by the Act of 1845—namely, 520; and next, that the allowance which was deemed to be adequate by the framers of that enactment for the maintenance of the students shall be diminished by the sum considered requisite, not merely for repairs, but for furnishing and finishing the new compartments of the establishment at Maynooth. Parliament must, therefore, have been clearly wrong, according to this Bill, when,

in 1845, it decided that £30,000 a year was not more than sufficient for the maintenance and instruction of the pupils at Maynooth. The House is now asked to declare, and particularly those hon. Members who supported the Act of 1845, that the amount they agreed to on that occasion was in excess, and that they did not know at the time how cheaply these Roman Catholic priests might be brought up. That is the first point which the House is now called upon to stultify itself. The second point upon which the House is asked to stultify itself is this:—It is invited to declare that the House has wrongfully refused to provide separately for the repairs of Maynooth since 1851. I fully admit that, as observed by the hon. Member for Youghal, there has been an omission—that the House did not do its work in 1851 so completely as it ought to have done, and that it would have been more consistent to have repealed the statutory obligation which appears to rest upon the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, under the Act of 1845. Well, that, I confess, was an oversight; but by the solemn decision of the House, arrived at after a long struggle, it was decided that these annual grants for the repairs of Maynooth should not be continued; and notwithstanding what has been stated by the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Butt), the Government, in deference to the feeling of the House and the country, have accepted the decision of the House that no further money should be voted for repairs. That is the second point in reference to which the House is called upon to stultify itself; because, what is the difference between appropriating money granted for an analogous purpose for repairs, and granting new funds for that specific purpose? It is the same thing, in fact; and that is the operation to which we are now called upon to assent. I must now call to the recollection of the House the circumstances which were so lightly passed over by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman says that people build houses and do not count the cost, and that by accident there was an excess in the Estimate of £30,000 for the repairs and new buildings at Maynooth contemplated by the Act of 1845; but that is simply a gloss put upon a grave subject. The facts of the case are these. I have taken great pains in going through the whole of the evidence up to this day, and these are the facts. In 1845 there was not only a sum of £30,000 granted for salaries and the maintenance of the students at Maynooth, but another £30,000 was given to provide adequate accommodation for the residents at Maynooth. Well, Sir, what was done? £30,000 was ample. I have shown on a previous occasion, from the evidence of Mr. Carus Wilson and of Sir Francis Head, that it was far more than ample to provide, by repairs and enlargement of the building, for the accommodation of the 520 students and the requisite staff of professors. What was done? Did they repair the old existing college? Not in the least. Did they merely add such a number of buildings as should provide a separate apartment for each of the students? Not at all. No, the authorities of the college gave Mr. Pugin, the architect, carte blanche for the magnificent scheme he proposed, and carefully asked for no estimate of its cost. That scheme was placed before the Commissioners of 1855, and there are drawings in their Report showing what it is, and how much of it has been completed. It provided, not for the better accommodation of the 520 students already in the institution, but, by adding 215 rooms to the existing ones, and which were quite sufficient, has already provided accommodation for 735 students. Why do I say that the accommodation in 1845, if the repairs were done—and they were done by separate Votes of this House—was quite sufficient for 520 students? Because the visitors who were appointed under the Act of Parliament reviewed in 1846 the state of the college, and found that there were 522 students at college, of whom 512 were resident; that they were not sleeping three in a bed, as was alleged in 1845; but that, with very moderate repairs of the then existing buildings, they were, to use the expression in the concluding paragraph of the Report, “on the whole, in a very satisfactory condition.” That Report I have now beside me. I will give you another proof to justify my assertion. There was no haste exhibited on the part of the authorities of Maynooth to undertake the new buildings. Not at all. In 1847 the visitors complained that no steps had been taken beyond laying the foundation of these great buildings, and implied no astonishment at the perfect satisfaction which reigned at Maynooth with the accommodation then existing. Again, in 1851, the principal reported, on behalf of the students, that he had nothing to complain of. He stated it for them, and they stated it for themselves. Yet not one room of the 215 new rooms was then occupied. Since then, it appears that, by falling back upon voluntary contributions and the property which the college possesses, these rooms have been brought into a state fit for habitation. And what do the visitors now report? They report from the president of Maynooth that it is absolutely necessary, if this enormously increased accommodation is to be preserved in a state of repair, that some additional funds should be provided. How are they to be found? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has told you, by taking from the provision for the maintenance of the professors and students, which in 1845 was not deemed excessive, the sum of £5,000 a year, or thereabouts. And for what purpose? Why, for the purpose of completing an addition to the college of 215 rooms, thus providing accommodation to that extent in excess of the amount limited by the Act of 1845. I put it to the House, then, are we not asked to stultify ourselves? But beyond that, we are asked to pledge the faith of Parliament to the continuance of the whole sum by the appropriation of this grant. I know that in these days Protestantism is not so rife as in 1851; still I conclude that there are some Protestants left in this House. I know there are in the country; and I do not think that the revelations of the Commission of 1855 have reconciled them to this institution. I do not believe that it is one whit more popular now than ever it was. Doubts are entertained as to the nature of the teaching in the College of Maynooth; whether it is that tolerant Roman Catholicism which prevailed at the commencement of the century, or whether it is that intolerant ultramontane system which has been of late too manifest. The visitors report that the marked circumstance of this last year is the formal and final rejection of the Gallican doctrines, as inculcated by Bailly, by the authorities of Maynooth, and the adoption of the ultramontane which are now dominant at Rome, in the form of the work of Scavini; and that work of Scavini is a compendium of the doctrines of Liguori, which are again derived of the teaching of the Jesuit Bussenbaum. I repeat that you have it stated in the visitor's report that the marked circumstance at Maynooth this year is the formal and final adoption of the teaching of ultramontane or Jesuit doctrines. Considering that it was thought right in 1845 to endow Maynooth, and provide for the wants and comforts of 520 students, in order to conciliate the Roman Catholics, I think the House will decide wrongly if it takes from that sum an amount which is estimated by the surveyor of Maynooth at £32,000, as necessary to complete the buildings and provide furniture, in accordance with Mr. Pugin's plan of enlargement, the whole cost of which has been estimated at £62,000, £30,000 being already spent upon the new buildings. The remaining £32,000, remember, is exclusive of all repairs, and will be applied to completing the accommodation in excess of that which in 1846 was quite sufficient. The Commissioners admit that the number of priests necessary for Ireland, with her diminished population, is not so great as formerly. Upon what grounds, then, of common sense can the House be asked to provide for accommodation for the education and maintenance of more students at Maynooth than were deemed sufficient in 1845? The Commissioners in 1855, and the visitors from year to year declare that that which has been really advantageous and really conciliatory in the Maynooth grant has been the better provision made by the Act of 1845 for the actual maintenance and teaching of the students; and it is that which you are now going to trench upon to the extent I have described by providing for the completion of an extension of the buildings at Maynooth, which is contrary to the Act of 1845. I think I have said enough to show that if you pass this Bill you are not at the end of the course upon which you are entering. You are asked to sanction an unlimited borrowing power. Grant that, and you sanction this grant in perpetuity. You diminish the comforts of the students resident at Maynooth permanently, and adopt a course calculated to prevent that institution from ever reverting to the position upon which it was founded by Mr. Pitt; that is, of being aided by Parliament, but supported mainly by voluntary contributions. Is there any reason to suppose that, if you agree to this measure, you will be able to stop here? Two years ago I ventured to tell certain right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the front bench below, and who were then in the Government, that if they reversed their votes against the grant, from that moment would increased demands be made by the more active members of the Roman Catholic body. I told them that charters would be demanded, that a university would be demanded, and that concession, instead of satisfying, would only stimulate demands. And so it proved. Last year the hon. Member for Dungarvan, and other Members of this House, including the present Attorney General for Ireland, waited on the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, to demand of him a charter for a Roman Catholic university; and the Attorney General stated, and the hon. Member for Dungarvan stated, that a sum of not less than £80,000 had been subscribed for that purpose. Well, if £80,000 can be so easily found for the establishment of a Roman Catholic university in Ireland, who can believe that funds would not be available for the repairs of the College of Maynooth? Protestants as well as Roman Catholics know that it is far easier to obtain public subscriptions for building purposes than for purposes of endowment; but by the present measure you are creating a building fund, and excluding the application to the maintenance of the fabric of Maynooth of funds which you know are ready for Roman Catholic purposes, while you place the students on short commons. Look around you in this country. It is a well-known fact that large sums are collected in this country which go to the Propaganda. Roman Catholic Members must excuse me. What I am stating is the question, and is fact. It is well known that the Propaganda receive considerable sums from this country and Ireland; but nothing like so large as those which they send hither for what they term the conversion, or, as I interpret it, the subjugation of England. Let them apply some of this money to the maintenance of the College of Maynooth. Look around you, I say again. On all sides you find springing up chapels, convents, monasteries, missions. Who, then, can doubt the abundance of Roman Catholic funds? I contend, therefore, that it is but right Maynooth should revert to its original foundation—the constitution established by Mr. Pitt; and should depend for its repairs and enlargement upon the voluntary contributions of the members of the Roman Catholic persuasion. When Lord Redesdale was Lord Chancellor of Ireland, in 1807, he prayed his Sovereign not to expect him to continue to act as visitor of Maynooth, for he told his Sovereign that he found that he appeared there in a state of ridiculous nullity, totally unable to control a seminary that was conducted upon Jesuit principles. Neither the present nor any Government of this country has any chance of controlling those principles but through the interference of the laity of the Roman Catholic Church. I believe that forcing Maynooth to depend upon voluntary contributions in some degree is the only means of bringing to bear the action of the Roman Catholic laity so as to correct a system of teaching and of discipline which is year by year deteriorating into a form more adverse to the constitution of this country.

Mr. Newdegate

MR. BELLEW said, that with reference to the observations of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, he might read an extract from a letter of the President of the College of Maynooth, which stated that "so far from its being true that the £30,000 was applied to any other than building purposes, some money had been paid by the trustees out of other funds, in addition to that £30,000, towards the expenses of building. The number of students never exceeded 520, except in 1853, when there were fourteen attached to the college whose charges were borne by private individuals."

Question put,

The House divided—Ayes 135 ; Noes 57 : Majority 78.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday next.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

The Report of the Committee of Supply was brought up.

On the Vote of £12,000 for Retiring Allowances of Officers of the Navy,

SIR CHARLES NAPIER opposed the Vote, which he said would be entirely useless for the purpose for which it was proposed. He had not met with any one in or out of the navy who approved the scheme. He had a certificate in proof of a statement which he made last night, and which was then contradicted, that a seaman who had lost an arm had been awarded a pension of £18 4s. for one year. He wished to know why the Admiralty should give the man the trouble of coming again at the end of the year, since they could not put on his arm again. With a war in China, and confusion in Europe, it was the duty of the House to do everything they could to assist in manning the British navy, which, up to the present time, had not been accomplished.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I think my noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty has scarcely been treated in that spirit of generosity which is due to him, with respect to that scheme of naval retirement which he has submitted to the House, at the instance of the Board whom he represents. For my own part, I am fully aware that he holds earnestly at heart the welfare of his brother officers and the good of his profession; but I am bound to confess that I regard that scheme as arbitrary in its enactments and harsh in its provisions. My noble Friend frankly owns that had he been entrusted with a larger sum than £12,000 at his disposal, he could have produced a better scheme. Let me, then, advise him to withdraw it in its present form, and at a more favourable opportunity, when a more liberal sum is at his command, reproduce it in an amended shape, calculated to meet the exigencies of the service and to enlist the sympathy of the profession. Should it appear indispensable to the well-being of the Royal Navy, in the opinion of this House and the country, that officers, on attaining the age of sixty years, must be removed from the active list, painful though the sacrifice may be, it must be borne by them. The necessity, however, should be proved beyond dispute which calls for a step so extreme; and, if positively demanded, the blow to their natural feelings of sorrow should be softened by a considerate regard for their future welfare to the close of life. Such treatment they have deserved by the zeal, fidelity, and courage which they devoted to their country from earliest youth, in every hour and in every service which England required it. And if now for good they are to be bidden to acquiesce in a compulsory removal and retirement, and to forego all opportunities henceforth of winning high place or emolument in the profession, it is only common justice which would award them a liberal acknowledgment of their past services. "True value still a true respect should have." I would invite the attention of the Secretary to the Admiralty to consider the extremely bad position in which mates in the Royal Navy will be placed if they are debarred from counting a portion of the time which they passed in that rank. Many of them have held the appointment of acting lieutenants, and a considerable number, after having passed the examination for a lieutenant's commission, have remained without promotion for several years. I would, therefore, recommend that a portion of the time should be reckoned as a lieutenant's service, in order to entitle them to an increase of allowance on retirement. I must confess to some doubts as to the advantages which, it is presumed, will accrue from a Commission such as it is proposed to nominate; its efficacy could only be secured by the appointment of impartial and intelligent members qualified to form a just judgment. I have made these observations in the hope that I am assisting to create good precedents as well as to follow them, and urging an honourable and just cause; for I cannot fail to remember that, unless we treat the services of others in our own time fairly and tenderly, it is a debt that will be sure to be paid when we are gone.

Mr. Newdegate

Resolutions agreed to.

House adjourned at half after Two o'clock, till Monday next.

man had asked a very sensible question as to what had led to the reconstruction of the Orange Society. He (Mr. Whiteside) would answer the question for him, although no one could answer it better than the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. It was as well the whole truth should be spoken. After the dissolution of the Orange Societies Mr. O'Connell commenced the greatest agitation which was ever seen in any country in the world. It appeared that the Orange party at Lurgan, on the occasion referred to, consisted of a number of people, 500 in all, men, women and children, who had gone to church—and he supposed he must regret that they had done so if it gave offence—and who were returning. It was not such numbers Mr. O'Connell brought together. When he was engaged in revolutionizing Ireland, he brought together hundreds of thousands of strong men, and, as he believed, brave men. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) was then Secretary for Ireland, and he directed a prosecution against Mr. O'Connell for those meetings and societies, which were very unlike the small affair at Lurgan, because they were well organized by a man of consummate ability as an agitator, and their avowed object was to change the Government of the country. It was a legitimate object in which Garibaldi had succeeded elsewhere. Mr. O'Connell did not admire English administration, and he wished to get rid of it if he could. It was exactly at that time that a body of persons of opposite opinions held meetings and drew up resolutions for the express purpose—it might have been wrong, but for the express purpose of disputing with Mr. O'Connell the possession of the country. That was the short history of the resuscitation of these societies. No one had laboured more in the good and wise attempt to repress the excesses of any body of politicians than Lord Eglinton. There were disturbances at Belfast, but 100 constables were sent down, and on the first occasion of a riot afterwards, they caught the rioters. The rioters were sent to gaol for a month, and they heard no more of riots at Belfast. He was not satisfied with the conduct of the officials on that occasion. If there were any procession which was forbidden by the law, how came it to pass that it was permitted to proceed? He doubted very much whether there was any procession; but, if there were, all the persons were engaged in an illegal act, and the process of detection was very simple, because it took place in broad day-light. These persons went to church. They left it, and he was told that a man's treading on a match was mistaken for the shot of a pistol. The firing at a cross was a very unlikely thing to take place, and he had heard with great pleasure that it was a fiction, and that nothing of the kind had occurred. What did occur, he was informed, was more natural. A shower of stones came from behind hedges and ditches as these people were proceeding home. He understood that they had no arms, and not even sticks; but, being naturally pugnacious they retired, and got into some house where there were arms. They returned, and, though in a great minority, forced a passage home. It was a very lamentable transaction, and, no matter who were right or who were wrong, he hoped all would be punished. If there were any illegal procession, there was law enough to punish them. But a riot in one corner of Ulster did not justify the description which had been given of a province nearly as large as Scotland. There was no part of Ireland where the Roman Catholics were more comfortable or were better paid, and he trusted they would live happily with those who differed from them; one mode to accomplish which was to repress those feelings to which the hon. Gentleman had directed his observations. It would be far better, in this instance, to have allowed these persons to go home, to have marked them, to have given information, and to have prosecuted them for the procession, if it were an illegal procession. He was very sorry that the transaction had occurred; but, he was sure, there was no spot in Her Majesty's dominions where justice was more efficiently administered than in that part of Ireland.

Mr. Whiteside

SIR WILLIAM VERNER said, the hon. Member for Kildare had endeavoured to make this impression on the House—that the only persons guilty of any outrages in Ireland were those whom the hon. Gentleman might call Orangemen if he liked, but who were the Protestants of Ireland, for it was against them as a body, and not against the Orange Society only, that the objection lay. He asked the hon. Member could he produce a single instance in which the Protestants had ever shot a person in broad daylight, in presence of hundreds of people, without one of them being found to come forward and give evidence against the murderer? The House was not fully aware of the nature of the society which had caused the remodelling and reforming of the Orange body. He meant the Ribbon Society. He would state a case to show what this society was. A gentleman who succeeded to a property in the North of Ireland appointed an agent to take charge of it. The agent went upon the property, and one of the first things he endeavoured to do was to establish a school. The schoolmaster was a Protestant, and in open daylight a party went to his house, dragged him out, and murdered him in presence of his two daughters, in front of his house. The murderer was taken with his coat covered with blood; the daughters identified him as engaged on the occasion, so that there could be no mistake. He was brought to trial in Armagh; and on two several occasions the jury disagreed and there was no verdict. This was stated to be owing to the presence of Ribbonmen on the juries; for by one of the oaths of the Ribbon Society the members bound themselves to on no account give evidence against a brother Ribbonman, no matter what the offence. The man was brought to trial a third time, the prosecutor having taken especial care to exclude Ribbonmen from the jury. The consequence was that the prisoner was found guilty and hung. In 1848, when Ireland was very disturbed, and the troops were obliged to be sent out of Dublin, the Lord Lieutenant could not find 200 men to depend upon without having recourse to the Orangemen. He accepted the services of 200 of them, and placed arms in their hands.

CEYLON RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM GALLWEY said, he had a notice on the paper to put certain questions to the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, regarding the Ceylon Railway; and he wished to express a hope that some statement would be made that might tend to tranquillize the minds of the colonists in that Island, who were excessively disturbed at the prospect of an enormous railway expenditure which threatened them; and that some measure would be suggested, if possible, to extricate them from the position in which they found themselves; very much owing to the mismanagement of the Colonial Office. He would say a very few words as to the origin, progress,

VOL. CLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

and present state of the Ceylon Railway. In 1856 the Governor in Council passed what was technically called an ordinance for reviving the Ceylon Railway Company, and calling on the Island to grant the sum of £1,200,000 to complete it. The decision of the Governor and of the Legislative Council was received in the Island with the greatest consternation. It was alleged that was not the result of a free expression of opinion on the part of the Representatives of the Island in the Legislative Council. The Council consisted of eighteen Members, eight of whom were official persons, on whom the Government could bring influence to bear; and the ordinance was carried by a majority of only one. The matter was referred home, and the Secretary for the Colonies was called upon to send out a competent engineer; and if he decided that the line could be made for £1,200,000, that then the Colonial Office should make arrangements with a Company to carry it out for that sum. The Colonial Secretary sent out Captain Moorsom; but unfortunately, as he was informed by that gentleman, with no instructions to make a working survey. Captain Moorsom made what was called a "flying survey," and declared that the line could be made for that sum; and by that course the agreement became an absolute one, and the colonists found themselves pledged not to make a railway for a definite sum, but pledged to a company to pay six per cent on an indefinite sum. The Company caused their own engineer to make another survey, when, to the horror of the colonists, he reported that the railway could not be made for a less sum than £2,250,000. When he stated to the House that this would entail an addition to the export duty on coffee of from 2½ to about 8 per cent, they would see that the consternation of the colonists was very natural. It might be said that Sir Henry Ward's somewhat rash conduct in regard to this railway was confirmed by subsequent addresses from the colonists. But at the time of the great railway excitement in Ceylon, there was a Cambridge house in Colombo, and he was told that the festivities held there produced these addresses in support of the Governor's proceedings. The railway had also been negligent and extravagant in carrying on its works; and he appealed to the hon. Baronet, the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), who was connected with the direction of the Company, to afford some explanation of its conduct. When the colonists referred to the Home Government for a complete survey, and an agreement defining the sum they were to pay, they also expressed a strong desire to have some gentleman possessing the confidence of the Island, and well acquainted with the locality through which the line was to pass, appointed on the direction of the railway to take care of their interests. To their great surprise and extreme disgust, however, instead of their request being complied with, they found the Government sending out a précis clerk from the Colonial Office to undertake that duty. He wished, therefore, to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies to suspend all expenditure on the Ceylon Railway, except such as is absolutely necessary for the preservation of works in progress; to inquire, in the event of the connection between the Railway Company and the colony being severed, whether the Government will submit to a strict audit all claims for repayment made by the Ceylon Railway Company; and whether the recent expenditure on surveys (swelling the sums expended under this head to above £100,000) was undertaken by the desire, or with the knowledge, of the Colonial Legislature?

MR. P. W. MARTIN asked what reason there could be for expending £2,000,000 upon an undertaking which a responsible English contractor was prepared to complete for a much smaller sum?

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that the House was not the proper place for discussing railway politics. The general meeting of the Ceylon Railway Company would be held next week, when he believed explanations would be given which would be satisfactory to the public in regard to the position of the undertaking. The cost of the surveys for the line was £39,000, not £100,000, as had been stated.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he must protest against the assumption that this railway project, though unfortunately not now in a flourishing position, had been in any degree forced upon the people of Ceylon by the Colonial Department. The Government had been repeatedly urged by the colonists to promote the making of a line between Kandy and the port of Colombo; and on their application Lord Taunton, when at the Colonial Office, entered into a provisional agreement with the Ceylon Railway Company. It was true that the provisional agreement was sanctioned only by a majority of one in the Legislative Council of Ceylon; but the Governor made its adoption an open question in the Council, and it was strongly opposed by the then Colonial Secretary, and present Governor of Ceylon. After Captain Moorsom's report was received, stating that the project might be carried out much within the limit of £1,200,000, the feeling of the colonists generally was decidedly favourable to the undertaking. The hon. Member was very naturally disappointed at what had since happened; but there had certainly been nothing approaching to a wish on the part of the Home authorities to force this project on a reluctant community. Some months ago his noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Office consulted the late eminent Mr. Stephenson upon the subject of this railway, and by his advice suspended all works upon the line, with very few exceptions. At the same time he ordered home Mr. Doyne, the resident engineer, and sent out the agents of two eminent contracting firms, in order that materials might be prepared for offering a contract. Since then the whole matter had been submitted to Mr. Hawkshaw, who recommended that the railway should be proceeded with at an estimated cost of £1,800,000. Certain offers for the surrender of the contract had been made by the company to the Colonial Office, and these, together with all the circumstances of the case, would be submitted to the Legislative Council, and to those commercial bodies which were entitled to be consulted in the matter, before any decision was arrived at. He apprehended that no such offer would be accepted without a thorough investigation of the affairs of the company. That statement nearly amounted to an answer to the second question of the hon. Baronet. With respect to the third question, he begged also to say that nothing would be done without consulting the wishes of the colony.

Sir William Galloway

MR. BUCHANAN complained that, although this railway had not been made, the planters had for some time been subjected to an additional export duty on their produce on its account.

MR. DUDLEY FORTESCUE said, that as one of the ill-used planters referred to, he thought that the complaints which had been just made were well founded.

Motion agreed to. House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CARDWELL said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill. When the Maynooth Act was introduced in 1845 a provision was contemplated by the Government and Parliament with respect to the annual repairs of the college. It was proposed, according to the statement of Sir Robert Peel, that the Board of Works should undertake the repairs of the college, in order that the business should be conducted with the greatest economy, and that the cost should be included in the annual estimates of the Board. Accordingly, in the Act itself the Board of Works were made Commissioners for the purpose, among others, of enlarging, improving, repairing, and furnishing from time to time the buildings constituting the College of Maynooth. That arrangement continued until 1851, which was the last year in which Parliament voted any sum of money for repairs at Maynooth. There was in the Treasury a balance which served the purpose in 1852. In 1853 the Government included in the estimate for the Board of Works the usual sum for the repairs of the college, but on the Motion of the hon. Member for Warwickshire, that Vote was rejected by a small majority, and no Vote had since been taken for Maynooth. Last year a memorial, praying that the annual Vote should be renewed, was presented to the Irish Government by the authorities of the college. The answer he returned was that it was then too late to consider the subject, and that even with regard to future years he could hold out no expectation that the Government would think it expedient to propose an annual Vote to Parliament. When the trustees of the college held their annual meeting in the present year he directed their attention to the Report of the Harrowby Commission, in which were set forth all the wants which the building now had in order to fit it for the purposes for which it was intended by Parliament. All the money originally appropriated had been expended, but the works were still in an unfinished state, and he could not understand the policy, when we had spent a large sum of money in erecting a building for the education of a number of men who were to be in an important degree the guides of the Irish population, of keeping those persons in a position of discomfort. If the building was not to be allowed to fall to pieces, money from some source must be found. It was hopeless to think of an annual Vote; but the Harrowby Commission had recommended a different arrangement, and the trustees of the college had informed him that, while they could not relinquish their claim to a Vote of Parliament for annual repairs, they felt themselves constrained under present circumstances to accept any reasonable expedient by which the building might be saved from falling to decay, and the health and comfort of its inmates might be secured. Having received that communication, he thought it right immediately to ask the permission of the House to give effect to that arrangement. It was proposed to deal with the sum of £5,000 a year as mentioned in the last paragraph of the Report. That amount was by the Maynooth Act assigned in sums of £20 each to 250 senior students, and the Commissioners recommended that the fund for repairs should be obtained by suspending those payments. Then came the question, how was the amount to be applied? For the annual repairs the whole sum would be more than sufficient, but the whole sum was not immediately available, as the trustees would not suspend the allowances to any of those pupils to whom they were already given. Their interests would continue to be preserved, and it was only by the suspension of the allowances to new pupils that funds could be obtained. At the same time it would not be right to suspend the allowances with respect to the whole of the new students, as it was necessary to afford some encouragement to merit in any scholastic institution. At any rate, the whole sum would not be available for some period. The application of the money would not be limited to mere repairs, but the chapel—a necessary building in any scholastic institution—would be finished, and care would be taken to provide proper ventilation, lighting by gas, and baths. To meet this expense it was proposed to allow, with the previous sanction of the Treasury, the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, who had a sum of money in their hands similar to that which the Exchequer Loan Commissioners dispensed, to make advances to complete the college and keep it in repair, on the credit of the sum of £5,000 a year. It was not intended to make any addition to the college directly or indirectly, but simply to complete it and repair that which would otherwise fall

to ruin. He was sorry that the hon. Member for Warwickshire intended to offer opposition to the Bill, and he should have thought that the hon. Member, having great objection to the endowments of the pupils of the college, would have supported the Bill, which drew on those endowments for the repairs of the college. The House must either permit a building erected at great expense to fall to ruin—a result which would have most important consequences of a moral and political character—or, since it would not appropriate funds for the repair of the building, it must consent to the present Bill, which trespassed on the funds assigned to the students.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. SPOONER said, he rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. As the House was aware, he dissented altogether to the institution, as he thought it was contrary to the Protestant constitution of this country to do anything in support of a system of education completely subversive of the Protestant religion. He would not enter into details on the present occasion, his general views having been so often stated in respect to a perpetual charge on the Consolidated Fund for Maynooth. He objected to the Bill on two grounds. First, that it enabled the Government to apply grants of public money to the extension of the College of Maynooth, and secondly, that it entailed the cost of the annual repairs of the college upon the country. Ever since 1853 the House had declared that they would have nothing to do with the repairs, and they took away the powers of the Commissioners, not because they grudged the money, but because they thought it an object to which the sanction of Parliament ought not to be given. But he had still stronger objections to the second clause, by which the trustees and Commissioners were authorized to borrow and lend money for that purpose. The moment that was done the country was responsible for the payment of the loan. The House was in reality now asked to give perpetuity to the grant. It was nothing more nor less than paying money in perpetuity for that to which he was conscientiously opposed. He felt no enmity against the Roman Catholics. They ought to enjoy their civil rights, but he did object to any assistance being given by a Protestant Parliament to the propagation of the Roman Catholic religion. The doctrines taught in that college were completely subversive of the articles of our pure Reformed Church, which articles the Sovereign of this country was bound by the Coronation Oath to maintain. These doctrines were, moreover, contrary to the Word of God, and such as a Protestant nation ought not to encourage. He believed that this country owed the great blessings which it had so long enjoyed to its Protestantism; and he believed further, that the judgment of Heaven would fall on us if we diverged from it. As long as he had a seat in the House he felt bound to express his conviction. He had another objection to the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had put a face upon the question it really did not bear. It was not to keep a public building in repair; it was not to make the pupils in the college comfortable that the Bill was proposed; it was to undo what Parliament had done in 1853, and, by a side-wind, to sanction a departure from what Parliament then had enacted, and to introduce a practice entirely contrary and opposed to our pure Protestant Constitution.

Mr. Cardwell

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day three months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR WILLIAM VERNER seconded the Amendment, which he believed would meet with the approbation of the country. He wished to know whether the funds which it was now proposed to apply might not be used for the purpose of extending the present buildings and increasing the number of pupils?

MR. WHALLEY said, he also objected to the Bill, not because the doctrines taught in the College were contrary to the Word of God—not because the object of the Bill might be to increase the number of Roman Catholic pupils in the College, but because the object was to remove the annual grants made to the College from the jurisdiction of Parliament. The 2nd clause enabled the trustees to borrow money on the security of the grant; and immediately that section was passed the grant, instead of being a subject of discussion year by year, whether it should be renewed or not, would be removed from the pale of discussion, for the money borrowed would be borrowed by authority of Parliament. The House had been by a recent Bill supported by the Government, called on to recognize the doctrine, discipline, laws, canons, and usages of the Roman Catholic Church. He had made some inquiry into those matters, and if any one was prepared to contend that the doctrines, discipline, laws, canons, and usages of the Roman Catholic Church were such as to entitle the college to further support, he for one was prepared to enter upon the discussion, if the promoters of the Bill were willing to submit the subject to such discussion; but if not, then this Bill — pretending to be for repairing the buildings of Maynooth, but being really for the purpose of changing altogether the nature of the existing grant by removing it beyond the ordinary control of that House, and thereby preventing future discussion of the doctrines, discipline, laws, canons, and usages there taught and used—ought to be rejected.

MR. GEORGE said, he should support the second reading. He believed that the principle of the Bill was not that there should be a shilling added to the grant, but that there should be an authority to devote the surplus money already granted to the repairs of the building. Therefore he gave his assent to the second reading.

MR. BUTT said, he was not satisfied with the Bill, and could not consent to vote for it if it abrogated a pledge solemnly given by Parliament that there should not be an annual grant to Maynooth for the purpose of repairs. He thought that it did amount to a distinct pledge that the repairs should be defrayed by Parliament, and he hoped that when the Bill went through Committee words would be inserted which would leave open the important question of an annual grant.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, I wish to make a few remarks with regard to the position in which the House stands in reference to this Bill. I believe that I can show that the House is asked to stultify itself by agreeing to any such measure. In the first place, the Bill proposes that the same number of students shall be educated at Maynooth as were provided for by the Act of 1845—namely, 520; and next, that the allowance which was deemed to be adequate by the framers of that enactment for the maintenance of the students shall be diminished by the sum considered requisite, not merely for repairs, but for furnishing and finishing the new compartments of the establishment at Maynooth. Parliament must, therefore, have been clearly wrong, according to this Bill, when,

in 1845, it decided that £30,000 a year was not more than sufficient for the maintenance and instruction of the pupils at Maynooth. The House is now asked to declare, and particularly those hon. Members who supported the Act of 1845, that the amount they agreed to on that occasion was in excess, and that they did not know at the time how cheaply these Roman Catholic priests might be brought up. That is the first point which the House is now called upon to stultify itself. The second point upon which the House is asked to stultify itself is this:—It is invited to declare that the House has wrongfully refused to provide separately for the repairs of Maynooth since 1851. I fully admit that, as observed by the hon. Member for Youghal, there has been an omission—that the House did not do its work in 1851 so completely as it ought to have done, and that it would have been more consistent to have repealed the statutory obligation which appears to rest upon the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, under the Act of 1845. Well, that, I confess, was an oversight; but by the solemn decision of the House, arrived at after a long struggle, it was decided that these annual grants for the repairs of Maynooth should not be continued; and notwithstanding what has been stated by the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Butt), the Government, in deference to the feeling of the House and the country, have accepted the decision of the House that no further money should be voted for repairs. That is the second point in reference to which the House is called upon to stultify itself; because, what is the difference between appropriating money granted for an analogous purpose for repairs, and granting new funds for that specific purpose? It is the same thing, in fact; and that is the operation to which we are now called upon to assent. I must now call to the recollection of the House the circumstances which were so lightly passed over by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman says that people build houses and do not count the cost, and that by accident there was an excess in the Estimate of £30,000 for the repairs and new buildings at Maynooth contemplated by the Act of 1845; but that is simply a gloss put upon a grave subject. The facts of the case are these. I have taken great pains in going through the whole of the evidence up to this day, and these are the facts. In 1845 there was

Cadets at Sandhurst,
c. Question (Gen. Buckley), 1335

Cadetships—Navy

c. Com. moved for (Capt. Esmonde), 1341, [A. 24, N. 81, M. 57] 1345

CAIRD, Mr. J., Stirling, &c.

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl. 3. Amend. 323, 1521

Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 819

Census (England), Com. cl. 6, Amend. 1740, 1741

Excise and Assessed Taxes Acts, Com. Res. Amend. 948, 951, 952

CAIRNS, Sir H. M. Belfast

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 28, 1628; cl. 33, 1631; cl. 49, 1637, 1638; cl. 77, 1642, 1645, 1646; cl. 152, 1999, 2007, 2160

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, Amend. 1051, 1053, 1057, 1058, 1059

Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.) Report, 946

Representation of the People. Com. 102, 104, 112

CAITHNESS, Earl of

Harbours of Refuge, 1080

Caledonian and Crinan Canals Bill,

c. 2R.* 225;

3R. 816; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams) 817, [c.q., A. 98, N. 47, M. 51] 820

CAMPBELL, Lord—see CHANCELLOR, THE LORD

CAMPERDOWN, Earl of

Cornwall, Duchy of, Limitation of Actions, Com. cl. 1, 315

Rifled Cast Iron Guns, 492

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of

Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 645, 659

Glebe Houses, Dilapidation of, 295

CARDWELL, Rt. Hon. E. (Chief Secretary for Ireland), Oxford City

Academy, Royal Irish, 423

Appointments, Irish, Res. 1009

Army Estimates, 614

Brehon Law Commission, 423

Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1729, 1736

Destitution (Ireland), Address moved, 1024

Dublin, Outrage in, 1530

Dundalk, Arrests in, 199

Education, National, (Ireland), Address moved, 2059, 2067

High Sheriffs, (Ireland), 879

Ireland, Destitution in, 200

Italy—Foreign Enlistment, 574

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland), 2R. 293; Com. cl. 2, 548; cl. 4, 550; cl. 10, 669, 671; cl. 22, 992; cl. 25, 996, 998; cl. 34, 1191; cl. 36, 1192; cl. 37, 1199; cl. 40, 1334; Consid. add. cl. 1848, 1849

Landed Estates Court (Ireland), 1200

CARDWELL, Rt. hon. E.—cont.

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), (No. 2), Com. cl. 1, 2154

Maynooth College, Leave, 1606; 2R. 2277

Party Banners in Ireland, 2269

Peace Preservation (Ireland), Leave, 1839, 1840, 2156

Poor Relief (Ireland), 1530

Representation of the People (Ireland), Bill withdrawn, 144

Tyrone, Outrage in, 1879

Vaccine Board, 1946

CARNARVON, Earl of

Australian Colonies—Introduction of Animals, 498, 500

New Zealand, Disturbances in, 417

CASHEL, Bishop of

Benefices, Union of, Re-Com. cl. 15, 317

Ecclesiastical Courts, &c. (Ireland), 2R. 220

CASTLEROSSE, Viscount (Vice Chamberlain of the Household) Kerry Co.

Berwick-upon-Tweed Election, Her Majesty's Answer to Address, 560

Cathedral and Collegiate Churches Commission,

l. Question (Lord Lyttelton), 550

CAVE, Mr. S., New Shoreham

Slave Trade, African, 202

Supply—China War, 1896

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res. 4, 1985

CAYLEY, Mr. E. S., Yorkshire, N. Riding

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 129, 1990; cl. 132, 1991, 1992; cl. 152; Adj. moved, 2006, 2165

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 91, 1059

Highways, 2R. 1366

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 408, 410; cl. 2, 849; cl. 7, 971; cl. 10, 973, 976

Yeomanry, Officers of, 1335

CECIL, Lord R. T. G., Stamford

Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1722, 1724

Gas (Metropolis), Com. 1687, 1689

Supply—China War, 1907

Census (England) Bill,

c. Com. cl. 4, 1695; Amend. (Mr. Baines) 1702; Amend. (Mr. Childers) 1738; Amend. neg. 1739; Amend. (Sir J. Trelawny) ib.; Amend. withdrawn, 1740;

cl. 6, Amend. (Mr. Caird), 1740; Amend. neg. 1741;

3R.* 1847

l. 1R.* 1925; 2R.* 2126

Census (Ireland) Bill,

c. Com. cl. 3, Amend. (Mr. Monnell) 1741; 3R.* 1847

l. 1R.* 1925; 2R.* 2126

Census (Scotland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 2110

Ceylon Railway,

c. Question (Sir W. Gallwey), 2273

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (The Right Hon. Lord Campbell),

Adulteration of Food or Drink, Com. cl. 1, 760
 Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), 2R. 2014
 Ballot, Vote by, and Manhood Suffrage, Res. 13
 Charities, Endowed, 1R. 1; 2R. 1188, 1189
 Conjugal Rights (Scotland), 1R. 2020
 Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction, 3R. 322
 Evidence, Law of, Further Amendment, 1R. 1085
 Furious Riding and Driving, 2R. 497
 Land, Titles to (Scotland), Act Amendment, 2R. 2015, 2019
 Law and Equity, Com. 834, 842, 1616, 1617
 Masters and Operatives, 2R. 1325
 Parliamentary Business, Com. moved for, 2150
 Plea on Indictment, 2R. 759
 Probate and Divorce Court, Returns moved for, 3
 St. George's-in-the-East, 1513
 Westminster, New Palace at—The Clock, 219

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, (Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone), Oxford University

Bonding Ports, 2228
 Bronze Coinage, The, 1947
 Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 817, 820
 Corks, Spanish, Exportation of, 179
 Education, 2R. 2024
 Excise and Assessed Taxes Acts, Com. Res. 951, 952, 953, 954
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 178
 Galway Contract, 1766, 1768
 Harbours of Refuge, Res. 713
 Inland Bonding, Com. cl. 6, 815, 816
 Inland Revenue Officers, 1525
 Paper Dnty Repeal, 1862; Res. 2095
 Probate Registrars, District, 2228
 Property and Income Tax, 445
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, (Ireland) Com. 2011, 2012
 Savings Banks, &c., Com. 894, 896, 897, 898, 902, 903; cl. 1, 906, 907, 1662, 2223, 2226, 2227
 Supply, Rep. 1309;—Operations in China, 1823, 1831, 1888, 1898, 1900; Report, 1951
 Tax Bills, Res. 1430, 1438
 Telegraph to Gibraltar, 180
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res. 1, 1963, 1981, 1982, 1983; Res. 4, 1984, 1986; Res. 6, 1987; Res. 10, 1988; Res. 11, 1989, 2125

Charing Cross,

c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart) 519

Charities, Endowed, Bill,

l. 1R. 1; 2R. 1188;

Com. moved for (Marquess of Clanricarde), 1190;

3R.* 1378

c. 1R.* 1520

CHELMSFORD, Lord

Charities, Endowed, 2R. 1189
 Conjugal Rights (Scotland), 1R. 2021
 Jews Act Amendment, Com. 1745, 1748
 Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, Amendment, 2R. 2128
 Law and Equity, Com. 841, 1617
 Weights and Measures, Com. 1313; Amend. 1314

CHICHESTER, Earl of

Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 979 ;
 Com. Amend. 1945
 Ecclesiastical Commissioners' Valuation, 554

CHILDERS, Mr. H. C. E., Pontefract

Army Estimates, 605 ; Amend. 614
 Census (England), Com. cl. 4, Amend. 1738
 Colonial Military Expenditure, 331
 Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com. 2122; cl. 5, Proviso, 2124
 Navy Estimates, 458, 459
 New Zealand, Disturbances in, 527, 2036
 Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 454;—Packet Service, 1224

China,

Naval Pay, c. Question (Sir G. Peckell), 182 ;
 Com. moved for, (Mr. B. Cochrane), 1667 ;
 Motion withdrawn, 1674
Operations in, c. Observations (Sir Henry Willoughby), 1808 ;—(Supply), 1812 ; Amend. (Sir H. Willoughby), 1823 ; Adj. moved (Mr. B. Cochrane), 1833 ; Motion withdrawn, 1839 ; Res. (Mr. B. Cochrane), 1879 ; Motion neg. 1887 ; Report, 1947
Pirates—the Colonial Office, l. Petition (Earl Grey), 1082 Stores, Conveyance of, from India, c. Question (Mr. Somes), 184.

Church Rates Abolition Bill,

l. 2R. 618 ; Amend. (Duke of Marlborough), 638, [o. q., Contents 31, Not-Contents 128, Majority 97] 663

Church Rates Law Amendment Bill,

c. 2R. 1346 ; Bill withdrawn, 1348

Church Temporalities (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill,

l. 2R.* 218 ;
 Com. cl. 6, 552 ;
cl. 8, Amend. (Earl of Donoughmore), 553 ;
 Amend. neg. 554 ;
 3R. add. cl. (Marquess of Clanricarde), 987 ;
cl. neg. 988
 c. 1R.* 1330

CHURCHILL, Lord A. S., Woodstock

New Zealand, Disturbances in, 521

CHURSTON, Lord

Cornwall, Duchy of, Limitation of Actions,
 Com. cl. 1, 315

Civil Service Estimates—Supply,

c. 450 ; Amend. (Mr. Aug. Smith), 452 ; Amend. withdrawn, 455, 1221

CLANRICARDE, Marquess of Charities, Endowed, Com. moved for, 1190 Church Temporalities (Ireland) Act Amendment, Com. cl. 6, 553 ; 3R. add. cl. 987

 Ecclesiastical Courts, &c. (Ireland), 2R. 220
 Galway Harbour, 3R. Amend. 1844
 Harbours of Refuge, Com. moved for, 1069,
 1074, 1081, 1082, 1190
 Holyhead Harbour, Com. moved for, 1759, 1761
 India—European Troops, Returns moved for, 555
 Light-Weight Racing, 2R. 304
 Militia and Constabulary (Ireland), Returns moved for, 844
 Savoy—Paper moved for, 1925, 1936
 Tramways (Ireland), 2R. 2216, 2218

CLAY, Mr. J., Kingston-upon-Hull

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 77, 1643
 Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com.
cl. 5, Amend. 2124
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 4, 856
 Paper Duty Repeal, Res. 2089
 Supply—Packet Service, 1232
 Tax Bills, Res. 3, 1605

Clearance Inwards and Lien for Freight Bill,

c. 1R.* 1520 ; 2R.* 1617

Clerk of the Council,

c. Reply (Viscount Palmerston), 191

CLEVELAND, Duke of

Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 982

CLIVE, Mr. G. (Under-Secretary of the Home Department), Hereford

Destitution (Ireland), Address moved, 1028
 Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.), Report, 934
 Marine Stores, Dealers in, Com. cl. 3, 1377
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 397, 404,
 409 ; cl. 2, 848, 851, 854 ; Amend. 856 ; cl.
 7, 970, 971 ; cl. 10, 972, 974, 975, 976 ; add.
cl. 1333

COBBETT, Mr. J. M., Oldham

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1062
 Coroners (No. 3), 2R. 2110
 Felony and Misdemeanour, 2R. 748

COCHRANE, Mr. A. D. Baillie, Honiton

China (Navy), Com. moved for, 1667, 1674 ;—
 Operations in, 1811 ; Res. 1879
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 19, 1330
 Navy Estimates, Adj. moved, 2213
 Representation of the People, Com., Adj.
 moved, 143
 Supply—Post Office, 1235 ;—Operations in China, Adj. moved, 1833, 1838

COGAN, Mr. W. H. F., Kildare Co.

Party Banners in Ireland, 2262, 2270
 Supply—Packet Service, 1221, 1224

Coinage Offences Bill,

c. 2R.* 280

COLCHESTER, Lord

Naval Discipline 2R. 1616

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Lanarkshire

Business, Public, 2187
 European Forces (India), 2R. 1095
 Representation of the People, Com. 51

COLLIER, Mr. R. P., Plymouth

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 32, 1630 ;
cl. 49, 1637
 Offences against the Person, 2R. 275
 Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1396

COLLINS, Mr. T., Knaresborough

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 77, 1641
 Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.), Report, 944
 Savings Banks, &c., Com. Amend. 905

Colonial Military Expenditure,

c. Question (Mr. Childers), 331

Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act (1853) Amendment Bill,

c. 1R.* 1345 ; 2R.* 1617 ; 3R.* 1945
l. 1R.* 2012

CONINGHAM, Mr. W., Brighton

Army Estimates, 613
 Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 84, 1764
 Navy Estimates, 2212
 Paper Duty Repeal, Res. 2100
 South Kensington Museum, Com. moved for,
 726
 Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1415, 1601

Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Bill,

l. 1R. 2020

CONOLLY, Mr. T., Donegal Co.

Irish Appointments, Res. 999, 1022
 Land, Tenure and Improvement of (Ireland),
 Com. cl. 37, 1199

Copyhold and Inclosure Commissions Bill,

c. 1R.* 1658 ; 2R.* 1695 ; 3R.* 2110
l. 1R.* 2126

CORBALLY, Mr., M. E., Meath Co.

Keogh, Mr., Appointment of, 1534

Corks, Spanish, Exportation of

c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), 175

Cornwall, Duchy of (Limitation of Actions) Bill,

l. Com. cl. 1, Amend. (Lord Kingsdown), 314 ;
 Report, 501

Coroners' (No. 3) Bill,

c. 2R. 2110

Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill,

c. 1R.* 992

Corrupt Practices Preventions Act,
c. Question (Mr. Hunt) 175

CORRY, Rt. Hon. T. L., Tyrone Co.
Galway Contract, 1766
Supply—Packet Service, 1234
Tyrone, Outrage in, 1864

Councillors of Burghs and Burgesses (Scotland) Bill,
c. 3R.* 322
l. 1R.* 417; 2R.* 755; 3R.* 1236

COWPER, Rt. Hon. W. F. (Chief Commissioner of Works), Hertford
Charing Cross, 520
Kensington Gardens, Road through, 1618,
1664, 2253
Nelson Monument, The, 1776
Parks, The, 520
Parliament, New Houses of, 510, 521
Patents, Commissioners of, Offices, 998
Smithfield Market, &c., 2R., 21

CRANWORTH, Lord
Benefices, Union of, Re-Com. cl. 15, 318
Charities, Endowed, 1R. 1; 2R. 1189
Ecclesiastical Courts, &c. (Ireland), 3R. 990
Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction, 3R. 321
Land, Titles to, (Scotland) Act Amendment,
2R. 2018
Railway Cheap Trains, 2R. 1657

CRAUFURD, Mr. E. H. J., Ayr, &c.
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 77, 1644
Land, Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment,
2R. 742
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 10, 974

CRAWFORD, Mr. R. W., London
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, 1527; Com. cl.
129, 1990
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res.
1, 1981; Res. 4, 1986

Criminal Lunatic Asylum Bill,
c. 1R.* 322; 2R.* 559; 3R.* 845
l. 1R.* 908; 2R.* 1236

Criminal Statutes Repeal Bill,
c. 2R.* 280

CROOK, Mr. J., Bolton
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1051, 1058, 1060, 1066; cl. 2, 1068; add. cl.
1069
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 19, 1330.

CROSSLEY, Mr. F., Yorkshire, W. Riding
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 28, 1625
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1063
Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1727
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 403, 413;
cl. 2, 416; cl. 10, 975
Supply—Packet Service, 1231

Crown Debts and Judgments Bill,
c. 1R.* 1380; 2R.* 1761; 3R.* 1945
l. 1R.* 2012

Customs and Excise, Officers of
c. Question (Mr. Blake), 1526

Customs Department—Supply,
c. 1234; Rep., 1309

DALGLISH, Mr. R., Glasgow
Births, &c., Registration of, (Scotland), Com.
cl. 4, Adj. moved, 1236
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1059

DAWSON, Mr. R. P., Londonderry Co.
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1 1052
Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1737
Party Banners in Ireland, 2268

DEASY, Rt. Hon. R., (Attorney General for Ireland), Cork Co.
Appointments, Irish, Res. 1020
Keogh, Mr. Appointment of, 1534
Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
Com. cl. 10, 667, 671; cl. 22, 992; cl. 25,
993, 998; cl. 32, 1191; cl. 36, 1192; cl. 37,
1195; Consid. add. cl. 1848, 1849
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), (No. 2), 2R.
262; Com. cl. 1, 2153; cl. 35, 2155
Roman Catholic Charities, Com. cl. 3, 1690
Volunteer Corps (Ireland), 1201

DEEDES, Mr. W., Kent, E.
Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment, Com.
738
Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 819
Coroners (No. 3), 2R. 2113
Highways, 2R. 1358
Maynooth College, Leave, Adj. moved, 1607
Roman Catholic Charities, Com. cl. 2, 491
Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 22

DE GREY AND RIPON, Earl of, (Under Secretary for War)
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 640
Lands Clauses Consolidation Act Amendment,
2R. 2127, 2128
Rifled Cast Iron Guns, 494
Tithe Commutation, Com. 1656, 2215

Defences, National
c. Question (Sir F. Smith), 189;—Observations
(Sir C. Napier), 196; Question (Mr. Hankey), 1768;—see Portsmouth.

DENISON, Rt. Hon. J. E.—see SPEAKER, THE

DENMAN, Lord
Furious Riding and Driving, 2R. 498
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, Com.
174; 3R. Amend., 221

DENMAN, Hon. G., Tiverton
Felony and Misdemeanour, 2R. 744
Offences against the Person, 2R. 280
Professional Oaths Abolition, 2R. 730

DERBY, Earl of

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), 2R. 2014
 Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 659
 Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 983
 Harbours of Refuge, 1079
 India—Education, 1238
 Land, Titles to, (Scotland) Act Amendment, 2R. 2016, 2019, 2020
 Light-Weight Racing, 2R. 295, 298, 308
 Masters and Operatives, 2R. 1323
 New Zealand, Com. 1518
 Parliamentary Business, Com. moved for, 2129
 Scottish Drainage, &c., Company, 3R. 1843
 Tithe Commutation, Com. 2315
 Westminster, New Palace at—The Clock, 218, 219

DERRY, Bishop of

Church Temporalities (Ireland) Act Amendment, Com. cl. 6, 553; cl. 8, 554; 3R. add. cl. 988
 Ecclesiastical Courts, &c. (Ireland), 2R. 220

DICKSON, Col. S. A., Limerick Co.

Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 346
 Army Estimates, 590, 596, 597, 614
 Army Surgeons, Rank of, 191, 192 :—Medical Officers, Address moved, 537 :—State of the, 870, 876, 877
 Kensington Gardens, 2252
 Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 10, 668; cl. 37, 1195; Consid. add. cl. 1850
 Militia, Leave, 1045
 New Zealand, 524
 Promotion from the Ranks, Address moved, 565
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Ireland), Com. 2012
 Representation of the People, Com. 37
 Volunteers (Ireland), Leave, 2110

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea

Highways, 2R. 1366
 Locomotive, Com. cl. 5, 1047, 1048
 South Kensington Museum, Com. moved for, 726
 Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1457

Dioceses, Subdivision of, Bill,

l. 1R.* 1925

Diplomatic Service,

c. Com. moved for (Mr. G. Duff), 714; Motion withdrawn, 724

Disqualified Candidates, Votes for, Bill,

c. Leave, 537; 1R.* 539; 2R.* 845

DISRAELI, Rt. Hon. B., Buckinghamshire

Business, Public, 2168, 2182
 Late Sittings of the House, Res. 1960
 Paper Duty Repeal, Res. 2101
 Petitions—Rules of the House, 761
 Representation of the People, Com. 87, 130, 231
 Supply—Operations in China, 1838
 Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1484, 1496, 1601

DIVERT, Mr. E., Exeter.

Excise and Assessed Taxes, Com. Res., 950, 953

DODSON, Mr. J. G., Sussex, E.

Harbours of Refuge, Res. 681
 Whitworth Gun, 1667

Dominica Hurricane Loan Bill,

c. 1R.* 1190; 2R.* 1380; 3R.* 1658
l. 1R.* 1742; 2R.* 2215

DONOUGHMORE, Earl of Church Temporalities (Ireland) Act Amendment, Com. cl. 8, Amend. 553

 Ecclesiastical Courts, &c. (Ireland), 2R. 220
 Holyhead Harbour, Com. moved for, 1760
 Probate and Divorce, Court of, Returns moved for, 3
 Railway Cheap Trains, 2R. 1657
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, Com. 167, 173; 3R. 221

DOUGLAS, Sir C. E., Banbury

Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1738
 Supply—China War, 1898
 Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1465

DUFF, Mr. M. E. G., Elgin, &c.

Diplomatic Service, Com. moved for, 714, 723

DUKE, Sir J., London

Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 19, 22

DUNBAR, Sir W., Wigton, &c.

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl. 10, 329

DUNCOMBE, Rear-Adm., Hon. A. Yorkshire, E. Riding

Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 334, 340, 348, 368
 Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2202
 Naval Reserve, Res. 4, 39
 Navy Estimates, 488

DUNCOMBE, Hon. W. E., Yorkshire, N. Riding

Representation of the People, Com. 266

DUNCOMBE, Mr. T. S., Finsbury

Corks, Spanish, Exportation of, 175
 Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.), 5, Report, 936
 Lords, House of, Proceedings of the, 856
 Mumford, Jesse, Case of, 22
 Petitions—Rules of the House, 761
 Privileges of the House, Tax Bills, 1345, 1383, 1524
 Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 21

DUNGANNON, Viscount

Commanders of Packets between Holyhead and Kingston, 1186, 1188
 Glebe Houses, Dilapidation of, 295
 Holyhead Harbour, Com. moved for, 1760
 St. George's-in-the-East, 1507, 1512
 Shipwrights, English, in French Dockyards, 161, 164, 843

DUNKELLIN, Lord, Galway Bo.
Supply—Packet Service, 1234

DUNLOP, Mr. A. M., Greenock
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl.
2, 323; cl. 8, 327; cl. 21, 514; cl. 7,
Amend., 1521; add. cl. 1523
Bible, Printing of the, 2261
Births, &c., Registration of (Scotland), Com.
cl. 4, Amend. 1236
Census (England), Com. 1741
Supply—Packet Service, 1224

DUNN, Mr. J., Dartmouth
Senior Naval Lieutenants, 1850

DUNNE, Col. F. P., Queen's Co.
Army Estimates, 592, 596, 597, 610, 615
Army—General Officers, Com. moved for,
1841
Destitution (Ireland), Address moved, 1029
European Forces (India), 2R. 1274
Holyhead Harbour, 531
India, Prize Money in, 1531
Land, Tenure and Improvement of, Com. cl.
2, 548, 549; cl. 10, 667; cl. 25, 997
Promotion from the Ranks, Address moved,
563 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Ireland), Com. 2010
Supply—Packet Service, 1222, 1229;—Inland
Revenue Department, 1234
Weedon Inquiry, The, 580

DURHAM, Bishop of
Benefices, Union of, 3R. 506

East India Stock Transfer, &c., Bill,
c. 1R.* 1658

Ecclesiastical Commission Bill,
c. 2R. Adj. Debate, 748, 954; Amend. withdrawn, 970

Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2) Bill,
i. 1R.* 755;
2R. 977;
Com. 1944; Amend. (Earl of Chichester), 1945

Ecclesiastical Commissioners' Valuation,
l. Question (Lord Portman), 554

Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries (Ireland) Bill,
l. 2R. 219;
3R. Amend. (Bishop of Oxford), 988; Amend.
neg. 991
c. 1R.* 1330

Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction Bill,
l. 3R. 321
Royal Assent, 1312

Education Bill,
c. 2R. 2021; Amend. (Mr. Pease), 2022, [o. q.,
A. 51, N. 122, M. 71] 2034

EDWARDS, Major H., Beverley
Wakefield Election, Res. 145

EGERTON, Hon. A. F., Lancashire, S.
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, Amend.
1059, 1066; add. cl. 1069

EGERTON, Hon. W., Cheshire, N.
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1060

Election Committees,
c. Question (Mr. Warner), 331

ELLENBOROUGH, Earl of
Benefices, Union of, Re-Com. 316; cl. 15, 319;
cl. 27, 320; 3R. 505, 506
India—European Troops, Returns moved for, 555, 556, 557;—Education, '1237;—Prize
Money, 1742, 1744
Naples—Interference of the French, 557, 559
St. George's-in-the-East, 1513
Sicily—Gen. Garibaldi, 1879

ELLICE, Rt. Hon. E., Coventry
Army Estimates, 616
Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.) Report, 943

ELLICE, Mr. E., St. Andrews
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl.
16, 509; cl. 21, 514; add. cl. 1523

ELPHINSTONE, Sir J. D. H., Portsmouth
Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 360
Anchors and Chain Cables—Merchant Service,
Leave, 217
Ceylon Railway, 2275
China (Navy), Com. moved for, 1673
Defences, National, 190, 193
European Forces (India), 2R. 1120
Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2202
Harbours of Refuge, Res. 709
Navy Estimates, 2204, 2213
Supply—Operations in China, 1836, 1891, 1893

Endowed Charities Bill,
l. 1R. 1; 2R. 1188;
Com. moved for (Marquess of Clanricarde),
1190;
3R.* 1378
c. 1R.* 1520

ENFIELD, Viscount, Middlesex
Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment, Com.
Amend. 733
Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com.
2122
Militia, Leave, 1044
Militia, Officers of, 1335
Kensington Gardens, 2251

ESMONDE, Capt. J., Waterford Co.
Cadetships—Navy, Com. Moved for, 1841
Poor Relief (Ireland), 1530

ESTCOURT, Rt. Hon. T. H. S., Wiltshire, N.
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. 967
Felony and Misdemeanour, 2R. 748

[cont.]

ESTCOURT, Rt. Hon. T. H. S.—cont.

Gas (Metropolis), Com. 1683
 Gas, Sale of, Act Amendment (No. 2), 2R. 1050
 Marine Stores, Dealers in, Com. 1374
 Nuisances Removal, &c., Com. cl. 4, 1658, 1660
 Poor Law Board Continuance, 2R. 1311
 Professional Oaths Abolition, 2R. 731
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Bill withdrawn, 144
 Savings Banks, &c., Com. 889, 896; cl. 1, 908, 2220

European Forces (India) Bill,

c. Leave, 368 Adj. moved (Mr. Danby Seymour), 395; Adj. Debate, 762; 1R.* 815; 2R. 1080; Amend. (Mr. A. Mills), 1095; Adj. moved (Mr. Rich), 1177, [A. 83, N. 262, M. 179] 1178; Adj. moved (Mr. Danby Seymour), ib., [A. 51, N. 229, M. 178] 1179; Adj. moved (Mr. Hennessy), ib., [A. 43, N. 190, M. 147], 1180; Adj. moved (Mr. A. Mills), ib.; Motion neg. 1181; Adj. Debate, 1255; Adj. moved (Sir D. L. Evans), 1272; Motion neg., 1309; [o. q., A. 282, N. 53, M. 229] ib.;
 Question (Col. Sykes), 1201; (Mr. Torrens), 1254

EVANS, Lieut. Gen. Sir De Lacy, Westminster

European Forces (India), Leave, 806, 813; 2R. Adj. moved, 1262
 India—Local Army, 186, 528, 529
 Low Moor Gun Factory, 762

EVANS, Mr. T. W., Derbyshire, S.
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 851

EVERSLEY, Viscount
 Jews Act Amendment, Com. 1748

Evidence, Law of, Further Amendment Bill,
 l. 1R. 1084

EWART, Mr. W., Dumfries, &c.
 Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment, Com. 736
 Education, 2R. 2030
 Houses of Refuge, 1617
 India—Bengal Civilians, 187
 Labourers' Cottages (Scotland), Com. 1050
 Offences Against the Person, 2R. 277
 Parks, The—Charing Cross, 519
 Professional Oaths Abolition, 2R. 728
 Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 21

EXCHEQUER, CHANCELLOR of the—see Chancellor of the Exchequer

Excise and Assessed Taxes Acts,
c. Com. Res. (Mr. Laing) 947; Amend. (Mr. Caird) 948; Amend. neg. 952

Excise Duties Bill,
c. 1R.* 2110

FARQUHAR, Sir W. M. T., Hertford
 Business, Public, 2168, 2169, 2178
 European Forces (India), 2R. 1133
 Gas (Metropolis), Com. 1688

FARRER, Mr. J., Durham, S.
 Coroners (No. 3), 2R. 2115
 Harbours of Refuge, Res. 678
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 415

Felony and Misdemeanour
c. 2R. 744; 3R.* 1847
 l. 1R.* 1925

FENWICK, Mr. H., Sunderland
 Game Licences (Scotland), 1200

FERGUSON, Sir J., Ayrshire
 Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl. 5, 324; cl. 6, 325; cl. 8, 328; add. cl. 1523
 Births, &c., Registration of, (Scotland), Com. cl. 17, 1236
 Business, Public, 2179
 Lebanon Massacres, 1770, 2229
 Representation of the People, Com. Adj. moved, 26, 33, 41, 45

FERMOY, Lord, Marylebone
 Army Estimates, 600
 Destitution (Ireland), Address moved, 1026
 Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 10, 669, 670; cl. 25, 994, 997; cl. 37, 1199; Consid. add. cl. 1850
 Paper Duty Repeal, 2035; Res. 2078, 2105
 Peace Preservation (Ireland), Leave, 1839
 Poor Law Board Continuance, 2R. 1311
 Representation of the People, Com. 249
 Tax Bills, 1383; Res. 1, 1449; Res. 2, 1604; Res. 3, Adj. moved, 1605
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res. 1, 1982

Financial Statement—see Ways and Means.

FINLAY, Mr. A. S., Argyllshire
 Caledonian and Orinan Canals, 3R. 816

Fisheries (Scotland) Bill,
 l. 2R.* 417; 3R.* 834

FITZGERALD, Mr. W. R. S., Horsham
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 178, 517, 531

Foreshores at Pembroke Dock,
c. Question (Lord W. Graham), 1946

Forgery Bill,
c. 2R.* 280

FORTESCUE, Hon. D. F., Andover
 Ceylon Railway, 2276

FORTESCUE, Mr. C. S. (Under Secretary for the Colonies), Louth Co.
 Ceylon Railway, 2275
 New Zealand, Disturbances in, 524, 526, 2036

FOX, Mr. W. F., Oldham,
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 853

France,

Commercial Treaty with, c. Question (Mr. S. FitzGerald), 178, 517; (Mr. Baines) 515

FREELAND, Mr. H. W., Chichester

Highleigh Prebendal Schools, 332

Highways, 2R. 1354

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 22, Amend. 1331, 1332; add. cl. 1333

Nuisances Removal, &c., Com. add. cl. 1661

FRENCH, Col. F., Roscommon Co.

Appointments, Irish, Res. 1012

Business, Public, 561

Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 818

Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.) Report, 938

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 10, 666, 671; cl. 25, 995

Representation of the People (Ireland), Bill withdrawn, 144

Volunteer Corps (Ireland), 1200, Leave, 2106

Friendly Societies Act Amendment Bill,

c. 2R.* 396; 3R.* 1847

l. 1R.* 1925; 2R.* 2012

Furious Riding and Driving Bill,

l. 2R. 496; Amend. (Lord Portman) 498; Bill withdrawn, ib.

GALLOWAY, Earl of

India—Education, 1515

Labourers' Cottages (Scotland), Com. 2127

GALLWEY, Sir W. P., Thirsk

Ceylon Railway, 2273

GALWAY, Viscount, Retford, E.

Excise and Assessed Taxes, Com. Res. 954

Galway Harbour Bill,

l. 3R.* 1844; Amend. (Marquess of Clanricarde) 1845, [Contents 18, Not-Contents 26, M. 8] 1847

Game Certificates, &c., Bill,

c. 1R.* 1190; 2R.* 1253

GARNETT, Mr. W. J., Lancaster

Locomotive, Com. cl. 4, 1047; cl. 5, 1040

Weights and Measures, Uniform, 515

Gas (Metropolis) Bill,

c. Com. 1676; Adj. moved (Sir G. Lewis), 1686

Gas, Sale of, Act Amendment (No. 2) Bill,

l. 3R.* 146

c. 1R.* 396;

2R. 1050

Gas, Sale of, Act Amendment (No. 3) Bill,

c. 1R.* 1086; 2R.* 1345

ORGE, Mr. J., Wexford Co.

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 10, 667; cl. 22, 992; cl. 25, Amend.

993, 994; cl. 36, Amend. 1192; cl. 37, 1198

Maynooth College, 2R. 2281

Offences against the Person, 2R. 277

Representation of the People, Com. 66

GIBSON, Rt. Hon. T. M., (President of the Board of Trade), Ashton-under-Lyne

France, Commercial Treaty with, 516

Harbours of Refuge, Res. 693

Telegraph to Gibraltar, 178

GILPIN, Col. R. T., Bedfordshire

Army Estimates, 590, 593, 606

Militia, Leave, 1045

Poor Law Board Continuance, 2R. 1312

Weedon Inquiry. The, 586

GLADSTONE, Rt. Hon. W. E.—see CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER*Glebe Houses, Dilapidation of*

l. Question (Visct. Dungannon), 295

GLYN, Mr. G. C., Kendal

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 84, 1764

GOLDSMID, Sir F. H., Reading

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 32, 1630; cl. 49, 1637; cl. 96, 1765

Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com. 2118; cl. 5; 2124

Professional Oaths Abolition, 2R. 733

Property and Income Tax, 444

Roman Catholic Charities, Re-com. cl. 2, Amend. 831

Savings Banks, &c., Com. cl. 1, 908

GORE, Mr. W. R. O., Leitrim Co.

Appointments, Irish, Res. 1016

Excise and Assessed Taxes, Com. Res. 953

GRAHAM, Lord M. W., Herefordshire

Army Estimates, 610

Land, Government, Sale and Repurchase of, 168

Pembroke Dock, Foreshores at, 1946

Portsmouth, Defences of, 761

GRANVILLE, Earl (President of the Council)

Ballot, Vote by, and Manhood Suffrage, Res. 17

Benefices, Union of, Re-Com. cl. 15, 317

Berwick-upon-Tweed Election, Address moved, 423

Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 980, 984, 986

Galway Harbour, 3R. 1847

Harbours of Refuge, 1080, 1081

Holyhead Harbour, Com. moved for, 1761

India—European Troops, Returns moved for, 550, 557 :—Education, 1238, 1513, 1517

Land, Titles to, (Scotland) Act Amendment, 2R. 2018, 2020

Light-Weight Racing, 2R. 305

[cont.]

GRANVILLE, Earl—cont.

Masters and Operatives, 2R. 1324
 Naples—Interference of the French, 558
 Palermo, Bombardment of, 147
 Parliamentary Business, Com. moved for, 2144
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, Com.
 165, 170, 171, 174; 3R. 222
 St. George's-in-the-East, 1512
 Savoy—Paper moved for, 1939
 Sicily, Insurrection in, 757
 Sir John Barnard's Act, &c. Repeal, 2R. 4
 Scottish Drainage, &c. Company, 3R. 1843
 Slave Trade—Mozambique, Papers moved for,
 933
 Wine Duties, Reduction of the, Returns moved
 for, 421

Greenwich Hospital,

c. Res. (Sir C. Napier), 2189; Motion neg.
 2203

GREGORY, Mr. W. H., Galway Co.

Appointments, Irish, Res. 1006
 Lebanon Massacres, The, 1774

GREGSON, Mr. S., Lancaster

European Forces (India), 2R. 1289

GREVILLE, Col. F. S., Longford Co.

Guydir, Dr., Case of, 1851
 Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
 Com. 545; Consid. add. cl. 1850
 Volunteers (Ireland), Leave, Adj. moved, 2110

GREY, Earl

China—Pirates—The Colonial Office, 1082
 Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 648
 Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 980
 Westminster, New Palace at—The Clock, 219

GREY, Rt. Hon. Sir G., (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster), Morpeth

Appointments, Irish, Res. 1017
 Business, Public, 2176
 Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.), Report, 946
 Late Sittings of the House, Res. 1956
 Paper Duty Repeal, Res. 2105
 Representation of the People, Com. 39, 41, 45,
 48, 106
 Supply—China War, Report, 1948

GRIFFITH, Mr. C. DARBY, Devizes

Church Rates Law Amendment, 2R. 1347
 Cornetries in Cavalry Regiments, 672
 Forage—Cavalry Officers, Res. 566
 Land, Tenure and Improvement of (Ireland),
 Com. cl. 37, 1195
 Lebanon Massacres, The, 1772
 Naples and Sardinia, 1666
 Poor Law Board Continuance, 2R. 1311
 Representation of the People, Com. 143, 247
 Savoy, Annexation of, 1666
 Sicily, Annexation of, to Piedmont, Address
 moved, 1805
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res.
 1, 1983

GROGAN, Sir E., Dublin City

Dublin, Outrage in, 1528
 Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R.
 282
 Supply—Packet Service, 1233, 1234

Gunpowder, &c., Bill,

c. 1R.* 1330; 2R.* 2151

Guydir, Dr.—Case of

c. Question (Col. Greville), 1851

Hackney Carriages (Metropolis) Act Amendment Bill,

c. 1R.* 1345; 2R.* 2110

HADFIELD, Mr. G., Sheffield

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl.
 8, 328; cl. 16, 510, 1520; cl. 7, 1521; add.
cl. 1523
 Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. 2162
 Bonding Ports, 2228
 Census (Ireland), Com. cl. 3, 1741
 Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.), Report, 938
 Poor Law Board Continuance, 2R. 1310
 Probate Registrars, District, 2227
 Votes at Elections, Leave, 1675

HALIBURTON, Mr. T. C., Launceston

Galway Packet Contract, 1874

HAMILTON, Rt. Hon. Lord C., Tyrone Co.

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1053
 Destitution (Ireland), Res. 1027
 Tyrone, Outrage in, 1878

HAMILTON, Major W. F., Linlithgow

Army Estimates, 604
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 413

HANBURY, Mr. R., Middlesex

Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 20

HANKEY, Mr. T., Peterborough

Defences, National, 1768
 Marine Stores, Dealers in, Com. cl. 3, 1377
 Savings Banks, &c., Com. 886; cl. 1, 2226
 South Kensington Museum, Com. moved for, 727
 Supply—Inland Revenue Department, 1235;—
 Operations in China, 1822
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res.
 4, 1984

Harbours of Refuge,

l. Question (Lord Ravensworth), 218; Com.
 moved for (Marquess of Clanricarde), 1069; Motion withdrawn, 1082; Com. 1190
 c. Res. (Mr. Lindsay), 672; Previous Question moved (Mr. Baxter), 681; Question put, [A.
 145, N. 128, M. 17] 714
 See Holyhead

HARDINGE, Viscount

India—European Troops, Returns moved for 556

HARDWICKE, Earl of

China—Pirates—the Colonial Office, 1084
 Harbours of Refuge, 1077
 Holyhead Harbour, Com. moved for, 1758
 Naval Discipline, 2R. 1614
 Trotman's Anchors, 1181, 1186

HARDY, Mr. G., Leominster

Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment, Com. 734
 Education, 2R. 2030
 Felony and Misdemeanour, 2R. 746
 Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com. cl. 5, 2125

HARRINGTON, Earl of

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, Com. 169, 171; Amend. 174

HARRIS, Lord

India—Education, 1238

HASSARD, Mr. M. D., Waterford City

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, Com. 544; cl. 10, 668
 Savings Banks, &c., Com. cl. 1, 907

HEADLAM, Rt. Hon. T. E. (Judge Advocate General), Newcastle-on-Tyne

Guydir, Dr., Case of, 1851
 Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.), Report, 944

Health, Local Boards of, Bill,

c. 2R.* 396; 3R.* 761
 l. 1R.* 834; 2R.* 1181; 3R.* 1647

HENEAGE, Mr. G. F., Lincoln

Highways, 2R. 1358

HENLEY, Rt. Hon. J. W., Oxfordshire

Army Estimates, 611
 Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 28, 1625, 1627; cl. 40, 1631; cl. 46, 1635; cl. 77, 1646; cl. 84, 1763, 1764; cl. 136, 1994; cl. 152, Amend. 1995, 2166
 Business, Public, 2188
 Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 819
 Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1719
 Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. 748, 750
 Education, 2R. 2026
 Excise and Assessed Taxes, Com. Res. 949
 Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2201
 Gas (Metropolis), Com. 1687
 Highways, 2R. 1371
 Inland Bonding, Com. cl. 6, 816
 Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.), Report, Adj. moved, 945, 1624
 Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland), Consid. add. cl. 1848
 Late Sittings of the House, Res. 1962
 Marine Stores, Dealers in, Com. 1372; cl. 3, 1376
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 406; cl. 2, 853
 Navy Estimates, 485
 Nuisances Removal, &c., Com. cl. 4, 1659, 1660
 Offences against the Person, 2R. 279
 Professional Oaths Abolition, 2R. 732

HENLEY, Rt. hon. J. W.—cont.

Roman Catholic Charities, Consid. Amend. 824; Re-com. cl. 1, 825; cl. 2, 831; cl. 3, 1694
 Savings Banks, &c., Com. cl. 1, 2222, 2226

HENNESSY, Mr. J. P., King's Co.

Education, National, (Ireland), Address moved, Adj. moved, 2075, 2276
 European Forces (India), 2R. Adj. moved, 1179
 Galway Packet Contract, 1877
 Ireland, Destitution in, 197; Address moved, 1022
 Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland), 2R. 290; Com. cl. 2, 548
 Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), Com. cl. 36; Adj. moved, 2155
 Peace Preservation (Ireland), Leave, Adj. moved, 1839, 1841
 Poor Law Board Continuance, Com. 1923
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Ireland), Com. Amend. 2008
 Representation of the People (Ireland), Bill withdrawn, 144

HENNIKER, Lord, Suffolk, E.

Tithe Commutation, Com. add. cl. 548

HERBERT, Rt. Hon. H. A., Kerry Co.

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 10, 667
 Shea, Daniel, and the Islington Union, 225
 Supply—Packet Service, 1223

HERBERT, Rt. Hon. S., (Secretary of State for War,) Wiltshire, S.

Apprentices, Enlistment of, 1529
 Army Estimates, 590, 591, 592, 594, 596, 598, 599, 601, 606, 608, 610, 611, 613, 616
 Army Surgeons, Rank of, 192:—Medical Officers, Address moved, 535;—State of the, 876, 877;—General Officers, Com. moved for, 1338
 Cadets at Sandhurst, 1335
 China (Navy), Com. moved for, 1673, 1674
 Colonial Military Expenditure, 331
 Cornetries in Cavalry Regiments, 672
 Defences, National, 1768
 European Forces (India), 2R. 1160
 Inch Keith, 1852
 Knapsacks, Soldiers', 999
 Land, Government, Sale, and Re-purchase of, 193
 Low Moor Gun Factory, 762
 Militia, Leave, 1030
 Militia, Desertions from the, 331;—Commissions in, 1336
 New Zealand, Disturbances in, 528
 Officers' Chargers, 23
 Ordnance Survey—Civil Assistants 570
 Portsmouth, Defences of, 762
 Promotion from the Ranks, 563
 Reserve Fund, 1528
 Rifled Muskets, 2227
 Supply—Operations in China, 1812, 1821, 1822, 1823, 1888, 1889, 1890
 Weedon Inquiry, The, 585, 588
 Whitworth Gun, The, 1637
 Yeomanry Volunteer Corps, 1336

HERBERT, Hon. Col. P. E., Ludlow
Army Estimates, 612
European Forces (India), 2R. 1133
Telegraph to Gibraltar, 177

Heritable Securities, &c. (Scotland) Bill,
c. 1R.* 991; 2R.* 1380

Highland Roads, and Bridges, Bill,
l. 2R.* 295

Highleigh Prebendal Grammar School,
c. Question (Mr. Freeland), 382

Highways Bill,
c. 2R. 1348; Amend. (Mr. Hodgkinson), 1352,
[o. q., A. 203, N. 120, M. 83] 1372

Highway Rates Act Continuance Bill,
c. 1R.* 1658; 2R.* 1695; 3R.* 2110
l. 1R.* 2126

Highways, Roads, &c., Bill,
c. 2R.* 225

Highways (South Wales), Bill,
c. 2R.* 728

HODGKINSON, Mr. G., Newark-upon-Trent
Highways, 2R. Amend. 1348

Holyhead Harbour,
l. Com. moved for (Earl of Mayo), 1750; Motion withdrawn, 1761
c. Question (Col. Dunne), 531; (Mr. Stanley), 1216

HOPE, Mr. G. W., Windsor
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl. 6, 326
Labourers' Cottages (Scotland), Com. Amend.
1051
Supply—Packet Service, 1232

HOPWOOD, Mr. J. T., Clitheroe
Bronze Coinage, The, 1947

HORSFALL, Mr. T. B., Liverpool
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 96, 1765
Galway Contract, 1766

HORSMAN, Rt. Hon. E., Stroud
Appointments, Irish, Res. 1017
Business, Public, 2169, 2170, 2175, 2178, 2179,
2182, 2287, 2238, 2242, 2244, 2247
European Forces (India), 2R. 1148, 1178, 1180,
1181, 1203, 1309
Representation of the People, Com. 257
Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1561

HOTHAM, Lord, Yorkshire, E. Riding
Reserve Fund, 1527

Houses of Refuge,
c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart), 1617

HOWARD, Rt. Hon. Lord E., Arundel
*Poor Law Board Continuance, Com. Instruction, 1912, 1924

HOWES, Mr. E., Norfolk, E.
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. 959

HUBBARD, Mr. J. G., Buckingham
Church Rates Law Amendment, 2R. 1346
Kensington Gardens, 2250
Savings Banks, &c., Com. cl. 1, 2221

HUMBERSTON, Mr. P. S., Chester City
Apprentices, Enlistment of, 1528, 1529
Coroners' (No. 3) 2R. 2117

HUNT, Mr. G. W., Northamptonshire, N.
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 84, 1763
Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 175

Husband and Wife Relation Law Amendment Scotland) Bill,
c. 2R.* 423

Inclosure (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* 1617; 2R.* 1761; 3R.* 1945
l. 1R.* 2012; 2R.* 2126

Income Tax—see Property Tax,

Indemnity Bill,
c. 1R.* 1253; 2R.* 1380; 3R.* 1617
l. 1R.* 1647; 2R.* 1742; 3R.* 1925

India,
Army, European, l. Returns moved for (Marquess of Clanricarde), 555
c. Question (Sir D. L. Evans), 186, 528
Army, Organization of the, c. Question (Col.
Sykes), 183; (Sir H. Willoughby), 333
Bengal Army—Rewards to Officers, c. Question (Mr. Kennard), 185
Civilians Killed during the Mutiny, c. Question
(Mr. Vansittart), 182
Disarming of the Natives, c. Papers moved for,
(Mr. H. Baillie), 214
Education, l. Observations (Earl of Shaftesbury), 1287; Res. (Duke of Marlborough), 1252; Previous Question moved (Lord Brougham), 1253;—Petition, Bishop of Oxford, 1514
Leasing of Children, l. Returns moved for (Lord Brougham), 492
Prize Money, l. Question (Earl of Ellenbo-rough), 1742
c. Question (Col. Dunne), 1531
See East India Stock Transfer Bill—European Forces (India) Bill

Infants' Marriage Act Amendment Bill,
l. 1R.* 492; 2R.* 550; 3R.* 618

Infectious Diseases—Public Carriages
c. Question (Viscount Raynham), 560

INGHAM, Mr. R., South Shields
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 8, 972

INGRAM, Mr. H., Boston

Representation of the People, Com. 55

Inland Bonding Bill,

c. 1R.* 559; 2R.* 728;

Com. cl. 6, 815; 3R.* 934

l. 1R.* 977; 2R.* 1236

Inland Revenue Department—Supply,

c. 1234; Rep. 1309

Inland Revenue Officers,

c. Question (Mr. Norris), 1525

Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.).

c. Report, 934; Amend. (Sir H. Willoughby),

935, [o. q., A. 98, N. 111, M. 13] 939;

Adj. moved (Mr. Henley), 946; Adj. Debate, 1618

Ionian Islands Marriages Bill,

l. 1R.* 1312; 2R.* 1378; 3R.* 1842

Ireland,

Academy, Royal Irish, c. Question (Mr. Maguire), 423

Appointments, Irish, c. Res. (Mr. Conolly), 999; Motion neg. 1022

Brehon Law Commission, c. Question (Mr. Maguire), 423

Clare County Election, c. Report, 175

Destitution in, c. Question (Mr. Hennessy), 197; Address moved, 1022, [A. 49, N. 84, M. 35] 1030

Dublin, Outrage in, c. Question (Sir E. Grogan), 1530

Dundalk, Arrests in, c. Question (Mr. Whiteside), 194

Education, National, c. Address moved (Mr. Butt), 2036; Adj. moved (Mr. Hennessy), 2075, [A. 66, N. 177, M. 111] 2076; [m. q., A. 62, N. 196, M. 134] 2078

Galway Contract, c. Question (Mr. Corry), 1766; (Sir S. Northcote), 1865

High Sheriffs, c. Observations (Mr. Blake), 874

Keogh, Mr., Appointment of, c. Observations (Mr. M'Evoy), 1533

Land, Transfer of, c. Question (Mr. V. Scully), 859

Landed Estates Court, c. Question (Captain Stacpoole), 1200

Londonderry City Election, c. Report, 175

Militia and Constabulary, l. Returns moved for (Marquess of Clanricarde), 844

Party Banners, c. Question (Mr. Cogan), 2262

Reform Bill, The, c. Question (Mr. Brady), 25

Shea, Daniel, and the Islington Union, c. Question (Mr. H. A. Herbert), 225

Tyrone, Outrage in, c. Question (Mr. Maguire), 1862; Observations (Lord C. Hamilton), 1878

Volunteer Corps, c. Question (Col. French), 1200; (Captain O'Connell), 1535; Observations (Mr. Brady), 1858; Leave (Colonel French), 2106; Adj. moved (Col. Greville), [A. 61, N. 28, M. 33] 2110

See

Bank of Ireland Bill

Benefices (Ireland), Augmentation of Small, Bill

Ireland—cont.

Burial Grounds (Ireland) Act (1856) Amendment Bill

Census (Ireland) Bill

Church Temporalities (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill

Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act (1853) Amendment Bill

Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries (Ireland) Bill

Galway Harbour (No. 2) Bill

Land, Leasing and Improving, (Ireland) Bill

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland) Bill

Landed Property Improvement (Ireland) Bill

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill

Maynooth College Bill

Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill

Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act (1856) Amendment Bill

Phoenix Park Bill

Poor Relief, &c., (Ireland) Bill

Railways (Ireland) Act (1851) Amendment Bill

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Ireland) Bill

Representation of the People (Ireland) Bill

Spirits (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill

Tramways (Ireland) Bill

Weights and Measures (Ireland) Bill

Italy,

Correspondence, l. Explanation (Marquess of Normanby), 1608

Foreign Enlistment, c. Observations (Mr. E. James), 571

French interference, l. Question (Lord Brougham), 557

See Naples—Rome—Sicily

JACKSON, Mr. W., Newcastle-under-Lyme

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 851, 854; cl. 19, 1330; add. cl. 1334

Supply—Packet Service, 1226

JAMES, Mr. E., Marylebone

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 49, 1638; cl. 77, 1642; cl. 84, 1762, 1764; cl. 138, 1995; cl. 152, 1998

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1065

Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1723, 1724

Coroners (No. 3) 2R. 2115

Italy—Foreign Enlistment, 571

Kensington Gardens, Road through, 1664, 2247

Late Sittings of the House, Res. 1957, 1960

Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com. 2118; cl. 5, Amend. 2125

Mines Regulation, Com. cl. 10, 974, 975

Poor Law Board Continuance, 2R. 1812; Com. Adj. moved, 1929

Representation of the People, Com. 245

Tax Bills—Res. 1, 1429

JERVIS, Capt. H. J. W., Harwich

Army Estimates, 504, 600

European Forces (India), Leave, 813

New Zealand, Disturbances in, 527

Representation of the People, Com. 88

Wakefield Election, Res. 144, 146, 201

Jews Act Amendment Bill,

l. 2R.* 1807 ;

Com. 1745 ; Amend. (Lord Lyndhurst), 1750 ;
3R.* 1925JOHNSTONE, Hon. H. B., CanterburyShipwrights, English, in French Dockyards, 208, 211JOHNSTONE, Sir V. B., Scarborough

Harbours of Refuge, Res. 703

JOLLIFFE, Rt. Hon. Sir W. G. H., PetersfieldBankruptcy and Insolvency, 1647 ; cl. 152, 2006
Excise and Assessed Taxes, Com. Res. 952
Highways, 2R. 1365KEKEWICH, Mr. S. T., Devonshire, S.

St. George's-in-the-East, 1212, 1213

KELLY, Sir FitzRoy, Suffolk, E.Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 40, 1632 ;
cl. 41, 1633 ; cl. 49, Amend., 1635, 1636 ; cl.
67, Amend., 1638, 1639 ; cl. 74, 1640 ; cl.
84, 1763 ; cl. 136, 1995 ; cl. 152, 2004KENDALL, Mr. N., Cornwall, E.

Harbours of Refuge, Res. 687

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 411 ; cl. 2, 849KENNARD, Mr. R. W., Newport, Isle of Wight

Bengal Army—Rewards to Officers, 185

*Kensington Gardens, Road through*c. Question (Sir J. Shelley), 1618 ; (Mr. E.
James), 1664, 2247KINGLAKE, Mr. A. W., BridgwaterSicily, Annexation of, to Piedmont, Address moved, 1795Switzerland and France—The Congress, 1852, 1856KINGSDOWN, LordCornwall, Duchy of, Limitation of Actions,
Com. cl. 1, Amend., 314, 316 ; Report, 501

Law and Equity, Com. 842

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F., Perth

Diplomatic Service, Com. moved for, 723

European Forces (India), 2R. 1124

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, Amend. 409,
410 ; cl. 2, Amend. 413, 416, 845, 849 ; cl.
10, 975, 977

Slave Trade, African, 204

South Kensington Museum, Com. moved for, 728

York, Deanery of, 1946

KNIGHT, Mr. F. W., Worcestershire, W.

Highways, 2R. 1357

KNOX, Hon. Major W. S., Dungannon

Army Estimates, 614

Officers Chargers, 23

KNOX, Lt.-Col. B. W., Marlow (Great)

Army Estimates, 612, 613

*Labourers' Cottages (Scotland) Bill,*c. Com. 1050 ; Amend. (Mr. G. W. Hope), 1051
3R.* 1253

l. 1R.* 1312 ; 2R.* 1842 ;

Com. 2126

LAING, Mr. S., (Joint-Secretary to the Treasury), Wick, &c.

Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 818

Customs and Excise, Officers of, 1526

Excise and Assessed Taxes Acts, Com. Res.
947, 948, 949

Galway Packet Contract, 1871

Holyhead Harbour, 531

Marriage in the Preventive Service (Scotland), 1874*Land, Government, Sale and repurchase of,*
c. Question (Lord W. Graham), 188*Land, Leasing and Improving, (Ireland)*
Bill,

c. 2R.* 225

Land, Tenure, and Improvement of, (Ireland)
*Bill,*c. 2R. Adj. Debate, 282 ; Amend. neg. 294 ;
Com. 544 ;

cl. 2, 548 ; cl. 4, 550 ;

cl. 10, 665 ; Amend. (Lord Naas), 666, [o. q., A.
51, N. 127, M. 76] 671 ;

cl. 22, 992 ;

cl. 25, Amend. (Mr. George). 993, [o. q., A. 82,
N. 79, M. 3] 997 ; Amend. (Mr. M. Mahon),
[o. q., A. 117, N. 45, M. 72] 998 ;

cl. 32, 1190 ;

cl. 34 ; cl. 36, 1191 ;

cl. 37, 1192 ; Amend. (Mr. Maguire) 1194 .
[o. q., A. 140, N. 48, M. 92] 1200 ;

cl. 40, 1334 ;

Consid. add. cl. (Mr. Whiteside), 1847, [A. 19,
N. 86, M. 67] 1848 ; 2nd add. cl. 1849, [A.
26, N. 102, M. 76] 1850 ;

3R.* 2151

l. 1R.* 2215

Land, Titles to, (Scotland) Act (1858)
Amendment Bill,

l. 1R.* 1647 ;

2R. 2015

Land, Valuation of, Scotland Act Amend*ment Bill,*c. 2R. 740 ; Amend. (Mr. Black), 742, [o. q., A.
69, N. 116, M. 47] 743*Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (1845)*
Amendment Bill,

c. 2R.* 396 ; 3R.* 1617

l. 1R.* 1647 ;

2R. 2127

Landed Property Improvement (Ireland)
Bill,

c. 1R.* 1847 ; 2R.* 1945

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill,

c. 2R.* 280;
Com. cl. 1, 2151; Adj. moved (Mr. M'Mahon), 2152, [A. 8, N. 88, M. 80] 2154;
cl. 35, [A. 89, N. 21, M. 68] 2155;
cl. 36, Adj. moved (Mr. Hennessy), 2155

LANIGAN, Mr. J., Cashel

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
Consid. add. cl. 1849
Post Office Administration, 212
Supply—Civil Service, 450, 451, 454;—Packet
Service, 1221, 1222, 1227, 1229, 1230, 1231, 1232, 1233, 1234 :—Inland Revenue Department, 1235
Weights and Measures, Uniform, 515

Larceny, &c., Bill,

c. 2R.* 280

Larceny Laws Consolidation Act Amendment Bill,

c. 1R.* 1345

Late Sittings of the House,

c. Res. (Mr. Newdegate), 1953; Motion neg.
1963

Law and Equity Bill,

l. Com. 834, 1616; 3R.* 1742

LEATHAM, Mr. E. A., Huddersfield,
Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1422

Lebanon Massacres—see Syria

LEFROY, Mr. A., Dublin University,
Education, National, (Ireland), Address moved,
2075

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
Com. cl. 25, 997

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), Com. cl. 1, 2154

LEGH, Major G. C., Cheshire, N.

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1061

LESLIE, Mr. C. P., Monaghan Co.

Roman Catholic Charities, Re-Com. cl. 2, 833

LEWIS, Rt. Hon. Sir G. C., (Secretary of State for the Home Department),
Radnor

Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment, Com.
736

Bible, Printing of the, 2261

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1055,
1057, 1058, 1063, 1067

Business, Public, 2170, 2186, 2188

Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1792, 1717,
1719, 1738, 1759; cl. 6, 1740, 1741

Coroners (No. 3), 2R. 2110, 2113

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 175

Education, 2R. 2022

Lewis, Rt. hon. Sir G. C.—cont.

Election Committees, 331

European Forces (India), 2R. 1180

Felony and Misdemeanour, 2R. 747

Gas (Metropolis), Com. Adj. moved, 1685, 1686

Gas. Sale of, Act Amendment (No. 2), 2R.
1050

Highleigh Prebendal School, 332

Highways, 2R. 1343, 1367, 1371

Income Tax, 2034

Infectious Diseases—Public Carriages, 560

Land, Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment, 2R. 741

Late Sittings of the House, Res, 1959

Locomotive, Com. cl. 4, 1045; cl. 5, 1047,
1048

London Corporation, Bill withdrawn, 2215

Marine Stores, Dealers in, Com. 1373; cl. 3,
1375, 1376, 1378

Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com.
2119; cl. 3, 2123; cl. 5, 2124, 2125.

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 407, 410,
413; cl. 2, 414, 846, 850, 852; Amend. 854,
855; cl. 8, 972; cl. 19, 1330; cl. 22, 1332;
cl. 29, 1332; add. cl. 1333; Preamble 1334

Mumford, Jesse, Case of, 22

Navy Estimates, 2213

Poor Law Board Continuance, 2R. 1312

Privileges of the House, 1346

Professional Oaths Abolition, 2R. 730, 733

Roman Catholic Charities, Com. 490; cl. 2, 491, 492; Consid. 825; Re-Com, cl. 1, 830;
cl. 2, 832, 833; cl. 3, 1693

St. George's-in-the-East, 1213

Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 20, 21

South Kensington Museum, Com. moved for, 726, 727

Supply—Post Office, 1235

Tithe Commutation, Com. cl. 1, 542; add. cl.
543

Valuation of Property, 518

Votes at Elections, Leave, 1675

Whipping, Punishment of, 1663

York, Deanery of, 1946

LIDDELL, Hon. H. G., Northumberland, S.

Harbours of Refuge, Res. 702

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 398, 412
cl. 2, 847, 854, 855

Naval Reserve, Res. 427

LIFFORD, Viscount

Tramways (Ireland), 2R. 2218

Light-Weight Racing Bill,

l. 2P. 295; Amend. (Duke of Beaufort), 302
Amend. withdrawn, Bill withdrawn, 314

LINDSAY, Hon. Col. J., Wigan

Army Estimates, 593, 604, 612

Army Medical Officers, Address moved, 532, 533, 537;—General Officers, Com. moved
for, 1356, 1359

Knapsacks, Soldiers', 990

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 409, 412;
cl. 2, 415

Naval Reserve, Res. 424

Navy Estimates, 463

New Zealand, Disturbances in, 528

Promotion from the Ranks, Address moved 566

LINDSAY, Mr. W. S., Sunderland

Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 350
 Cadetships—Navy, Com. moved for, 1343,
 1344
 Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2200
 Harbours of Refuge, Res. 672, 712

Local Government Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R. 991 ; 2R.* 1190*Local Government Supplemental Bill,
c. 2R. 396 ; 3R.* 761*
l. 1R. 834 ; 2R.* 1312 ; 3R.* 1842*Local Government Supplemental (No. 2)
Bill,
c. 1R. 1847 ; 2R.* 1945*Local Taxation Returns Bill,
c. 1R. 845 ; 2R.* 1086 ; 3R.* 1520*
l. 1R. 1608 ; 2R.* 1742 ; 3R.* 2215LOCKE, Mr. JOHN, *Southwark

Cadetships—Navy, Com. moved for, 1344
 Coroners (No. 3), 2R. 2116
 Excise and Assessed Taxes Acts, Com. Res.
 950
 Gas (Metropolis), Com. 1687
 Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com.
 2119 ; cl. 3, 2123 ; cl. 5, 2125
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 416, 848
 South Kensington Museum, Com. moved for, 725

LOCKE, Mr. JOSEPH, Honiton

Army Estimates, 616
 Locomotive, Com. cl. 5, 1047, 1049

LOCKHART, Mr. A. E., Selkirkshire

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com.
cl. 6 ; Amend. 325

Locomotive Bill.

c. Com. cl. 4, 1045 ; cl. withdrawn, 1047 ;
cl. 5, Amend. (Mr. E. P. Bouverie). 1048 ; Adj. moved, [A. 39, N. 83, M. 44] 1049

LONDON, Bishop of

Benefices, Union of, Re-Com. cl. 15, 318 ; cl. 22
 320 ; 3R. Amend. 505, 507
 Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 984
 Ecclesiastical Courts, &c. (Ireland), 3R. 990
 St. George's-in-the-East, 1509

London Corporation Bill,
c. Bill withdrawn, 2215LONG, Mr. W., *Wiltshire, N.

Representation of the People, Com. 266

LONGFIELD, Mr. R., Mallow

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 77, 1644 ;
cl. 132, 1992
 Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 819
 Destitution (Ireland), Address moved, 1029

LONGFIELD, Mr. R.—cont.

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
 2R. 286 ; Com. cl. 10, 669 ; Amend. 671 ; cl.
 22, 992 ; cl. 25, 993, 995 ; cl. 32, Amend.
 1190, 1191 ; Consid. add. cl. 1849
 Representation of the People, Com. 52

Lords, House of, Proceedings of the

c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), 856 ;—see Paper Duties Repeal Bill—Tax Bills

LOVAINE, Lord, Northumberland, N.

Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 366
 Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2202
 Late Sittings of the House, Res. 1959
 Locomotive, Com. cl. 5, 1047
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2 ; Amend. 850,
 851 ; cl. 10, 974
 Roman Catholic Charities, Re-Com. cl. 2, 833
 Supply—Packet Service, 1231, 1233 ;—Inland
 Revenue Department, 1235 ;—China War, 1893

LOWE, Rt. Hon. R. (Vice-President of the Committee of the Privy Council for Education), Calne

Nuisances Removal, &c., Com. cl. 4, 1659, 1660
 Roman Catholic Charities, Com. cl. 3, 1691, 1693
 South Kensington Museum, Com. moved for, 724

Low Moor Gun Factory,

c. Question (Sir D. L. Evans), 762

LUCAN, Earl of

Galway Harbour, 3R. 1845
 Tramways (Ireland), 2R. Amend. 2218, 2219

LYGON, Hon. F., Tewkesbury

Navy Estimates, 459, 462
 Supply—Packet Service, 1230, 1233

LYNDHURST, Lord

Jews Act Amendment, Com. 1745 ; Amend.
 1750
 Law and Equity, Com. 837

LYTTELTON, Lord

Cathedral and Collegiate Churches Commission, 550
 New Zealand, 2R. 1329 ; Com. 1518

LYVEDEN, Lord

Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 618, 655, 663

M'CANN, Mr. J., Drogheda

Excise and Assessed Taxes, Com. Res. 953
 South Kensington Museum, Com. moved for, 727
 Supply—Packet Service, 1234

MACEROY, Mr. E., Meath Co.

Destitution (Ireland), Address moved, 1025
 Keogh, Mr., Appointment of, 1533
 Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
 2R. 288
 Promotion from the Ranks, Address moved, 562, 565

[cont.]

MACKIE, Mr. J., Kirkcudbright
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl. 8, 827

MACKINNON, Mr. W. A., Rye
Representation of the People, Com. 231
Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. Amend. 19

M'MAHON, Mr. P., Wexford Co.
Appointments, Irish, Res. 1015
Disqualified Candidates, Votes for, Leave, 539
Italy—Foreign Enlistment, 579
Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
Com. cl. 25, 996; Amend. 997
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) (No. 2), 2R.
282; Com. cl. 1, Adj. moved, 2151
Offences against the Person, 2R. 275
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Ireland), Com. 2012

MAGUIRE, Mr. J. F., Dungarvan
Academy, Royal Irish, 423
Brehon Law Commission, 423
Destitution (Ireland), Address moved, 1026
Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
Com. 545; cl. 25, 995; cl. 37, Amend. 1102
Peace Preservation (Ireland), Leave, Adj.
moved, 1839, 1840, 1841
Tyrone, Outrage in, 1862

Malicious Injuries to Property Bill,
c. 2R.* 280

Malicious Injuries to Property Act Amendment Bill,
l. 2R.* 146; 3R.* 295
Royal Assent, 417

MALINS, Mr. R., Wallingford
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 28, 1625,
1626; cl. 40, 1632; cl. 46, 1635; cl. 49, 1636,
1637, 1638; cl. 132, 1992; cl. 152, 2005, 2007,
2161
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. 960
Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.), Report, 939, 945
Savings Banks, &c., Com. 893, 897
Wakefield Election, Res. 146
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res.
10, 1989

MALMESBURY, Earl of Rome, Diplomatic Relations with, Papers moved
for, 158
Tuscany—The Yacht "Medina," 422

Man, Isle of, Harbours Bill,
c. 3R.* 1066
l. 1R.* 1181; 2R.* 2215

Manchester Cathedral Church Bill,
c. 1R.* 1345; 2R.* 1945

MANNERS, Rt. Hon. Lord J. J. R., *Leicestershire, N.
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1056,
1060, 1067; cl. 2, 1068; cl. 6, 1069
Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 818
Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1726, 1740

[cont.]

MANNERS, Rt. hon. Lord J. J. R.—cont.
Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2203
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, Amend. 410, 412 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Ireland), Com. 2010
Representation of the People, Com. 47
Roman Catholic Charities, Re-Com. cl. 1, 830;
cl. 2, 832
Supply—China War, 1888, 1901

Marine Stores, Dealers in, Bill,
c. Leave, 724; 1R.* 728; 2R.* 1050;
Com. 1372; cl. 3, 1375

MARLBOROUGH, Duke of
Benefices, Union of, Re-Com. cl. 15, 318
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. Amend. 629
Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 983
India—Education, 1238; Res. 1239, 1516, 1517
Scottish Drainage &c. Company, 3R. 1844

MARSH, Mr. M. H., Salisbury
Census (English), Com. cl. 4, 1720

MARTIN, Mr. P. W., Rochester
Ceylon Railway, 2275

MASSEY, Mr. W. N., (Chairman of Committees,) *Salford
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1067
Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
Com. cl. 2, 549
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 854
Navy Estimates, 2213, 2214
Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 452

Masters and Operatives Bill,
c. 3R.* 225
l. 1R.* 295;
2R. 1314; Amend. (Lord Ravensworth) 1323;
Amend. withdrawn, 1325

Maynooth College Bill,
c. Leave, 1606; 1R.* 1658;
2R. 2277; Amend. (Mr. Spooner) 2280, [o.g.,
A. 135, N. 57, M. 78] 2287

MAYO, Earl of
Holyhead Harbour, Com. moved for, 1750
Tramways (Ireland), 2R. 2219

Medical Act (1858) Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* 1190; 2R.* 1345; 3R.* 2110
l. 1R.* 2126

MELLOR, Mr. J., Nottingham
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 49, 1637
Professional Oaths Abolition, 2R. 732
Tax Bills, Res. 1, Adj. moved, 1601; Res. 2,
Amend. 1602

MELVILLE, Viscount
Naval Discipline, 2R. 1616

Metropolis Local Management Act Amendment (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* 423; 2R.* 665

[cont.]

Metropolis Local Management, &c. Bill—cont.

Com. 2117, [A. 78, N. 68, M. 10] 2123;
cl. 8, 2123; Amend. (Mr. Ayrton) 2124;
cl. 5, Amend. (Mr. Clay), [o. q., A. 86, N. 81, M.
 5] 2124; Amend. (Mr. E. James), 2125

Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment Bill

c. 1R.* 760; 2R.* 1050; 3R.* 1617
l. 1R.* 1647; 2R.* 1925; 3R.* 2215

MILDMAY, Mr. H. F., Herefordshire
 Trotman's Anchors, 1217

MILES, Sir W., Somersetshire, E.

Coroners (No. 3), 2R. 2116
 Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com.
 2122

Petitions—Rules of the House, 761

Militia,

Commissions in Volunteer Corps, c. Question
 (Viscount Enfield), 1335

Desertions from the, c. Question (Lord Burghley), 330

Militia Bill,

c. Leave, 1030; 1R.* 1045; 2R.* 1253

Militia Ballot Bill,

c. 1R.* 1945; 2R.* 2151

Military Attachés to Foreign Courts.

c. Question (Mr. Stanley), 332

MILLER, Mr. T. J., Colchester

Metropolis Local Government (No. 2), Com.
cl. 3, 2123

MILLS, Mr. A., Taunton

European Forces (India), 2R. Amend. 1086;
 Adj. moved, 1180, 1206, 1308
 Newfoundland Fisheries, 1665
 Professional Oaths Abolition, 2R. 730
 Supply—China War, 1900

MILNES, Mr. R. M., Pontefract

Business, Public, 2181
 Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1728
 Diplomatic Service, Com. moved for, 723
 European Forces (India), 2R. 1272

Mines Regulation and Inspection Bill,

c. Com. cl. 1, 396; Amend. (Mr. Paget), 397, [o. q., A. 178, N. 71, M. 107] 409; Amend. (Mr.
 Kinnauld) ib.; Amend. withdrawn, 410; Amend. (Lord J. Manners) ib.; Amend. withdrawn, 412, [m. q., A. 180, N. 91, M. 89] 413;
cl. 2, Amend. (Mr. Kinnauld) 414, [A. 77, N.
 146, M. 69] 417; 2nd Amend. 845; [A. 61, N.
 78, M. 18] 850; Amend. (Mr. Paget) ib.; Amend. withdrawn, 852; Amend. (Mr. Monsell), [o. q., A. 131, N. 69, M. 62] 854; Amend.
 (Mr. H. A. Bruce), [o. q., A. 106, N. 84, M. 22]
 855;
cl. 4, Amend. (Mr. Clive), [A. 132, N. 31, M. 101] 856;
cl. 7, Amend. (Mr. H. A. Bruce) 970; Amend.
 neg. 971;

Mines Regulation &c. Bill—cont.

cl. 10, Amend. (Mr. Ayrton), 973 [A. 185, N. 18,
 M. 167] 973; Amend. (Mr. H. A. Bruce), [A.
 47, N. 127, M. 80] 976;
cl. 19, 1330;
cl. 22, Amend. (Mr. Freeland) 1331;
cl. 29, Amend. (Mr. H. H. Vivian) 1332;
add. cl. (Mr. Ayrton) 1333;
 Preamble, 1334;
 3R.* 1617
l. 1R.* 1647;
 2R. 2216

MITFORD, Mr. W. T., Midhurst

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 405

MONCREIFF, Rt. Hon. J., see ADVOCATE, The Lord

MONSELL, Rt. Hon. W., Limerick Co.

Army Estimates, 592, 594, 597, 599, 602, 615
 Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1729
 Census (Ireland), Com. cl. 3, Amend. 1741
 Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
 Com. cl. 10, 667; cl. 34, Amend. 1191; cl. 37,
 1195; Consid. add. cl. 1849
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 852; Amend.
 854
 Poor Law Board Continuance, Com. 1923, 1924
 Roman Catholic Charities, Re-Com. cl. 1, 829;
cl. 2, 833
 Sicily, Annexation of, to Piedmont, Address
 moved, 1803
 Supply—Packet Service, 1229
 Weedon Inquiry, The, 585

MONTAGU, Lord R., Huntingdonshire

Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday, 2R. 541

MONTEAGLE, Lord

Bank of Ireland, 3R. 500
 Galway Harbour, 3R. 1846
 India—Prize Money, 1744
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 3R.
 220
 Tramways (Ireland), 2R. 2217
 Wine Duties, Reduction of the, Returns moved
 for, 418, 422

MOWBRAY, Rt. Hon. J. R., Durham City

Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.) Report, 941, 942

MUMFORD, Jesse, Case of

c. Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), 22

Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill,

c. 3R.* 1190
l. 1R.* 1236

MURF, Mr. D., Buteshire

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl. 2,
 323; cl. 5, 324; cl. 8, 327; cl. 10, Amend 328; cl. 14, Amend. 507, 508; cl. 28, 511;
add. cl. 1524
 Land, Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment, 2R. 742

MURRAY, Mr. W., Newcastle-under-Lyme
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 33, Amend.
1630; cl. 77, 1641; cl. 84, Amend. 1761, 1762;
cl. 129, 1990

NAAS, Lord, Cockermouth

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
Com. cl. 2, 549; cl. 4, 550; cl. 10, Amend.
665, 670; cl. 22, 992; cl. 25, 995, 998; cl.
36, 1192; Consid. add. cl. 1848

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), Com. cl. 36, 2155
Maynooth College, Leave, 1607

NAPIER, Vice-Adm. Sir C., Southwark

Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 354

China (Navy), Com. moved for, 1672, 1674

European Forces (India), 2R. 1180

Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2189, 2194, 2202

Lebanon Massacres, 1769

Locomotive, Com. cl. 5, 1048; Adj. moved,
1049, 1050

Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com.
2123

Naval Reserve, Res. 432

Navy Estimates, 457, 458, 460, 461, 462, 481,
488, 489, 2203, 2212, 2213, 2214; Report,
2287

Portsmouth, Defences of, 196

Supply—Packet Service, 1226;—Operations in China, 1837, 1907

Naples,

Alliance with Sardinia, Question (Mr. D.
Griffith), 1666

Bombardment, Apprehended, c. Question (Col.
Stuart), 1881

French, Interference of the, l. Question (Lord Brougham), 557

Naval Discipline Bill,

l. 1R.* 1181;

2R. 1612

Naval Reserve,

c. Res. (Mr. Lindsay), 424; Motion neg. 440

Navy,

Dockyard Labourers, Superannuation of, c. Question (Sir S. Northcote), 1201

Estimates, c. 455; Motion withdrawn, 490,
2203; Adj. moved (Mr. B. Cochrane), 2213;
Report, 2287

Greenwich Hospital, c. Res. (Sir C. Napier),
2189; Motion neg. 2203

Roman Catholics in the, c. Question (Mr. Bellew), 2229

Senior Naval Lieutenants, c. Question (Mr.
Dunn), 1850

See Cadetships

Nelson Monument

c. Question (Adm. Walcott), 1775

NEWCASTLE, Duke of, (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Australian Colonies—Introduction of Animals,
499

Cathedral and Collegiate Churches Commission, 551

NEWCASTLE, Duke of—cont.

China—Pirates—The Colonial Office, 1082

Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 658, 659

Commanders of Packets between Holyhead and
Kingstown, 1188

Cornwall, Duchy of, Limitation of Actions,
Com. 314; cl. 1, 315; add. cl., 316; Report, 503

New Zealand, 2R., 1326, 1329; Com. 1519

New Zealand, Disturbances in, 417, 418

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl.
21, 513

Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1724

Education, 2R. 2031

European Forces (India), 2R. 1180

Late Sittings of the House, Res. 1953, 1963

Locomotive, Com. cl. 5, 1048

Marine Stores, Dealers in, Com. 1374

Maynooth College, Leave, 1607; 2R. 2281

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 851, 854;
cl. 10, 977; cl. 22, 1332; add. cl. 1333

Poor Law Board Continuance, Com. 1922

Professional Oaths Abolition, 2R. 729

Representation of the People, Com. 243

Roman Catholic Charities, Consid. Amend.
617, 820, 824, 825; Re-Com. cl. 1, 827; Adj.
moved, 829, 831; cl. 2, Adj. moved, ib., 833,
834; cl. 3, 1691, 1692, 1693, 1694

Newfoundland Fisheries,

c. Question (Mr. A. Mills), 1665

New Zealand Bill,

l. 1R.* 1069;

2R. 1326;

Com. 1518

New Zealand, Disturbances in

l. Question (Earl of Carnarvon), 417

c. Question (Lord A. Churchill), 521; (Mr.
Adderley), 2035

Nice, Annexation of, see Savoy

NORMANBY, Marquess of

Italy, Explanation, 1608, 1611

Rome, Diplomatic Relations with, Papers moved
for, 160, 1842

Savoy, Paper moved for, 1937, 1939

Sicily, Insurrection in, 755;—Gen. Garibaldi, 1378, 1379

NORRIS, Mr. J. T., Abingdon

Gas (Metropolis), Com. 1686

Inland Revenue Officers, 1525

Marine Stores, Dealers in, Com. 1374

Nuisances Removal, &c., Com. cl. 4, 1658

Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 21

NORTH, Col. J. S., Oxfordshire

Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment, Com.
736

Army Estimates, 592, 597, 601, 608, 614

Army—General Officers, Com. moved for, 1338

China (Navy), Com. moved for, 1671

European Forces (India), 2R. 1298

NORTH, Mr. F., Hastings,
Gas (Metropolis), Com. 1688

NORTHCOTE, Sir S. H., Stamford
Army Estimates, 597, 602, 610
Dockyard Labourers, Superannuation of, 1201
Education, 2R. 2023
Galway Packet Contract, 1865
Supply—Packet Service, 1230, 1233;—Post Office, 1235;—Operations in China, 1822, 1901
Telegraph to Gibraltar, 177
Ways and Means—Financial Statement Res. 1, 1982

Nuisances Removal and Diseases Prevention Bill

c. Com. cl. 4, Amend. (Mr. P. Watlington), 1658;
add. cl. (Mr. Freeland), 1661;
3R.* 1945
l. 1R.* 2012

O'BRIEN, Mr. P., King's Co.
Peace Preservation (Ireland), Leave, 1840
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, Com. 2011
Volunteers (Ireland), Leave, 2110

O'CONNELL, Capt. D., Tralee
Volunteer Corps for Ireland, 1535

O'DONOGHUE, The, Tipperary Co.
Destitution (Ireland), Address moved, 1023
Education, National, (Ireland), Address moved, 2076
Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland), 2R. 283; Consid. add. cl. 1850
Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. Adj. moved, 144

O'FERRALL, Rt. Hon. R. More, Kildare Co.
Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland), Com. cl. 10, 666

Offences against the Person Bill,
c. 2R. 270

Offences within Her Majesty's Possessions Abroad Bill,
l. 1R.* 2215

Ordnance Survey—Civil Assistants,
c. Observations (Mr. Digby Seymour), 568

OSBORNE, Mr. R. B., Liskeard
Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 344, 345
Army Estimates, 611; Amend. 612
Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1715, 1717
Education, National, (Ireland), Address moved, 2076
Paper Duty Repeal, Res. 2096
Representation of the People, Com. 252
Shipwrights, English, in French Dockyards, 209, 211
Supply—China War, 1900
Switzerland and France—The Congress, 1855, 1856
Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1426

OXFORD, Bishop of Benefices, Union of, Re-Com. cl. 15, Amend. 316, 317, 318; cl. 27, 320
Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries (Ireland), 3R. Amend. 988
Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction, 3R. Amend. 321
India—Education, 1514
Railway Cheap Trains, 2R. 1657
Slave Trade—Mozambique, Papers moved for, 929, 933
Tithe Commutation, Com. 1656

Oxford University (No. 2) Bill,
c. 1R.* 728; 2R.* 934; 3R.* 2110
l. 1R.* 2126

PACKE, Mr. C. W., Leicestershire, S.
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1058, 1064
Tax Bills, 1524

Packets between Holyhead and Kingstown, Commanders of
l. Question (Visct. Dungannon), 1186

Packet Service—Supply,
c. 1221

PAGET, Lord C. E. (Secretary of the Admiralty), Sandwich
Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 338, 340, 345
Cadetships—Navy, Com. moved for, 1342, 1344
China—(Navy), Com. moved for, 1670
Dockyard Labourers, Superannuation of, 1201
Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2194, 2202
Holyhead Harbour, 1218
Naval Reserve, Res. 428
Navy Estimates, 455, 457, 458, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 466, 486, 489, 2208, 2212, 2213
Pembroke Dock, Foreshores at, 1946
Roman Catholics in the Navy, 2229
Senior Naval Lieutenants, 1851
Shipwrights, English, in French Dockyards, 210, 211
Trotman's Anchors, 560, 1219

PAGET, Mr. C., Nottingham
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 135, Amend. 1993
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, Amend. 396, 409, 410; cl. 2. Amend. 850, 852

PAKINGTON, Rt. Hon. Sir J. S., Droitwich
Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 347
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. 2162, 2164
Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1729
Education, 2R., 2032
European Forces (India), 2R. 1178
Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2199
Harbours of Refuge, Res. 689
Kensington Gardens, 2251
Military Attaches to Foreign Courts, 332
Navy Estimates, 455, 456, 457, 459, 466, 471, 488, 489, 2206, 2211, 2214
Supply—Operations in China, 1830, 1888; Report, 1947

PALK, Mr. L., Devonshire, S.
Excise and Assessed Taxes Act, Com. Res. 949

PALMERSTON, Rt. Hon. Viscount (First Lord of the Treasury), Tiverton
Appointments, Irish, Res. 1021
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, 1527; Com. cl. 77, 1643, 1646, 1647, 2007, 2163, 2164
Business, Public, 561, 2168, 2169, 2185, 2244
Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 819
Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1732
Clerk of the Council, 191
Defences, National, 191
Education, National, (Ireland), Address moved, 2076
European Forces (India), 2R. 1177, 1178, 1179, 1180, 1203
Galway Packet Contract, 1877
Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2201, 2203
Harbours of Refuge, Res. 710
Late Sittings of the House, Res. 1901
Lebanon Massacres, 1775
Lords, House of, Proceedings of the, 857
Maynooth College, Leave, 1606, 1607
Military Attaches to Foreign Courts, 332
Navy Estimates, 2214
Paper Duties Repeal, Res. Previous Question moved, 2086, 2105
Peace Preservation (Ireland), Leave, 1830, 1840, 1841
Poor-Law Board Continuance, Com. 1923
Postmaster General, Office of, 1762
Representation of the People, Com. 119, 143
Sicily, Insurrection in, 329
Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 453;—Operations in China, 1838, 1907
Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1383, 1384, 1506, 1536, 1601; Res. 2, 1602, 1603; Res. 3, 1604, 1605
Volunteer Corps for Ireland, 1585; Leave, 2109
Votes at Elections, Leave, 1675
Wakefield Election, Res. Adj. moved, 145

Paper Duty Repeal Bill,

c. Petition (Mr. Bright), 1253;—Notice (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1345; Observation (Sir J. Trevellyn), 1806; Question (Mr. Whalley), 1859; (Lord Fermoy), 2035; Res. 2078; Previous Question proposed (Visct. Palmerston), 2087; Previous Question put, [A. 138, N. 177, M. 39] 2106; Question (Mr. Puller), 2257;—See Tax Bills

Parks, The

c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart), 519

PARKER, Major W., Suffolk, W.
Army Estimates, 613
European Forces (India), 2R. 1207

Parliament, New Houses of—see Westminster, New Palace at

Parliamentary Business,

l. Com. moved for (Earl of Derby), 2129; Motion withdrawn, 2150

Parochial Assessments Bill,
c. 1R.* 559

Passing Tolls Bill,
c. 1R.* 322

Patents, Commissioners of, Offices,
c. Question (Mr. Tite), 998

PATTEN, Col. J. W., Lancashire, N.
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1064; Proviso, 1066
Highways, 2R. 1365
Locomotive, Com. cl. 5, 1049
Militia, Leave, 1042
Parliament, New Houses of, 518, 521

PAULI, Mr. H., St. Ives
Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment, Com. 735
Harbours of Refuge, Res. 703

PAXTON, Sir J., Coventry
Army Estimates, 595, 596, 598, 603

Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act (1856) Amendment Bill,

c. Leave, Adj. moved (Mr. Hennessy), [A. 11, N. 60, M. 49] 1839; Adj. moved (Mr. Brady), [A. 9, N. 61, M. 52] 1840; Adj. moved (Mr. Sullivan), [A. 11, N. 59, M. 48] 1841; Adj. moved (Mr. Maguire), [A. 7, N. 59, M. 52] ib.; Adj. moved (Mr. Blake); Motion withdrawn, [o. q., A. 53, N. 15, M. 38] ib.
1R.* 1841;
Question (Sir W. Verner), 2155

PEACOCKE, Mr. G. M. W., Maldon
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 138, 1995
European Forces (India), Leave, 803

PEASE, Mr. H., Durham, S.
Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. 753
Education, 2R. Amend. 2022
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 410; cl. 2, 848
Representation of the People, Com. 68

PECHELL, Rear Adm. Sir G. R. B., Brighton
China War—Naval Pay, 182

PEEL, Rt. Hon. Major Gen. J., Huntingdon
Army—General Officers, Com. moved for, 1340
China, Operations in, 1809
European Forces (India), Leave, 789; 2R. 1180
Supply—Operations in China, 1822

PEEL, Rt. Hon. F., Bury
Army Estimates, 595

PEEL, Sir R., Tamworth
Savoy and Nice, Annexation of, 860, 1254
Sicily, Annexation of, to Piedmont, Address moved, 1776, 1790
Switzerland and France—The Congress, 1854

Pembroke Dock, Foreshores at,
c. Question (Lord W. Graham), 1946

PENNANT, Hon. Col. E. G. D., Carnarvonshire

Locomotive, Com. cl. 4, 1046

Petitions of Right Bill,

l. 3R.* 295

Royal Assent, 1312

Petitions—Rules of the House,

c. Motion (Mr. T. Duncombe), 761

PETO, Sir S. M., Finsbury

Army Estimates, 606

Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1725

Harbours of Refuge, Res. 704

Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 20

PHILIPPS, Mr. J. H., Haverfordwest

Coroners (No. 3), 2R. 2115

Phoenix Park Bill,

c. 1R.* 19; 2R.* 423; 3R.* 655

l. 1R.* 755; 2R.* 1647; 3R.* 1842

PIGOTT, Mr. F., Reading

Army Estimates, 604, 613

Plea on Indictment Bill,

l. 2R. 757; 3R.* 908

c. 1R.* 1520

POLLARD-URQUHART, Mr. W., Westmeath Co.

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),

Com. cl. 10, 669; cl. 37, 1194; cl. 40, Amend. 1334

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), Com. cl. 35, 2154

Property and Income Tax, 444

Poor Law Board Continuance Bill,

c. 1R.* 934;

2R. 1310;

Com. 1912; Instruction (Lord E. Howard), 1921; Adj. moved (Mr. E. James), [A. 40, N. 97, M. 57] 1923; Motion withdrawn, 1924

Poor Law Rating,

c. Question (Mr. P. Watlington), 24

Poor Relief, &c., (Ireland) Bill,

c. 2R.* 761;

Question (Capt. Esmonde), 1530

PORTMAN, Lord

Cornwall, Duchy of, Limitation of Actions, Com. cl. 1, 314, 316; Report, 504

Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 980

Ecclesiastical Commissioners' Valuation, 554

Furious Riding and Driving, 2R. Amend. 497

Harbours of Refuge, 218

Portsmouth, Defences of,

c. Question (Lord W. Graham), 761

Postage (Army and Navy) Bill,

c. 1R.* 1190; 2R.* 1380; 3R.* 1945

l. 1R.* 2012

Postmaster General, Office of,
c. Question (Sir G. Bowyer), 1769

Post Office Administration,

c. Question (Sir G. Bowyer), 211

Post Office—Supply,

c. 1235

POWIS, Earl of

Benefices, Union of, Re-Com. cl. 15, 318; cl. 22, 320; 3R. Amend. 505

Church Temporalities (Ireland) Act Amendment, Com. cl. 6, 552

Privileges of the House—Paper Duty,

c. Notice (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1345;—see Paper Duty Repeal Bill—Tax Bills

Probate and Divorce, Court of

l. Returns moved for, 2

Probate Registrars, District,

c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), 2227

Professional Oaths Abolition Bill,

c. 2R. 728

Property and Income Tax,

c. Observations (Mr. Whalley), 441; Question, 2034

Property, Law of, Bill,

c. 3R.* 761

Property, Valuation of

c. Question (Mr. Stanley), 517

Protests

Bank of Ireland Bill, 500

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill, 223

Public Improvements Bill,

l. Royal Assent, 1312

PULLER, Mr. C. W. G., Hertfordshire

Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment, Com. 739

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 77, 1644

Paper Duties, 2257

Roman Catholic Charities, Re-Com. cl. 1, Amend. 829; cl. 3, Amend. 1692

Queen's Bench, Court of, Act Amendment Bill,

c. 1R.* 1190; 2R.* 1520; 3R.* 1847

l. 1R.* 1925; 2R.* 2126

Queen's Prison Bill,

c. 1R.* 1380; 2R.* 1617; 3R.* 1847

l. 1R.* 1925

Railway Cheap Trains, &c., Bill,

c. 1R.* 728; 2R.* 845; 3R.* 1253

l. 1R.* 1312;

2R. 1657; 3R.* 1842

Railways (Ireland) Act (1851) Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* 1658 ; 2R.* 1761

RAVENSWORTH, Lord

Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 981 ;
Com. 1944

Harbours of Refuge, 218

Masters and Operatives, 2R. Amend. 1820, 1825

Mines Regulation, &c., 2R. 2216

RAYNHAM, Viscount, Tamworth

Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment, Com. 733, 740

Anchors, 560

Infectious Diseases—Public Carriages, 560

Whipping, Punishment of, 1663

REDESDALE, Lord (Chairman of Committees)

Benefices, Union of, Re-Com. 321 ; 3R. 506

Business of the House, Res. 550

Commanders of Packets between Holyhead and
Kingstown, 1188

Conjugal Rights (Scotland), 1R. 2021

Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 982

Galway Harbour, 3R. 1846

Labourers' Cottages (Scotland), Com. 2127

Lands Clauses Consolidation Amendment, 2R.
2128

Light-Weight Racing, 2R. 295, 298, 313

Parliamentary Business, Com. moved for, 2148

Railway Cheap Trains, 2R. 1657

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 3R.
222

Scottish Drainage &c. Company, 3R. 1843

Tramways (Ireland), 2R. 2217, 2218

Reform Bill—Dissolution of Parliament,
c. Question (Mr. Blake), 23

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill,

l. Com. 165 ; Amend. (Earl of Harrington), 174 ;
Amend. withdrawn, ib ;

3R. 220 ; Amend. (Lord Denman), 221,
[o. q., Contents 36, Not-Contents 2, M. 34]
223

Protests, 223

Royal Assent, 417

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Ireland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 665 ; 2R.* 934 ;

Com. 2008 ; Amend. (Mr. Hennesay), 2009,
[o. q., A. 136, N. 38, M. 98] 2012

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Scotland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 991

Representation of the People Bill,

c. Com. Adj. Debate, 26 ; Adj. moved (Sir J.
Fergusson), 57, [A. 248, N. 269, M. 21] 139 ;
Adj. moved (Mr. B. Cochrane), [A. 222,
N. 267, M. 45] 143 ; Adj. moved (Mr. D.
Griffith), ib. ; Adj. Debate, 226 ; Amend. and Motion withdrawn ; Bill withdrawn, 270

Representation of the People (Ireland) Bill,
c. Bill withdrawn, 144

Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill,

c. Bill withdrawn, 144

Reserve Fund,

c. Question (Lord Hotham), 1527

RICARDO, Mr. J. L., Stoke-upon-Trent

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 10, 975

Navy Estimates, 458, 460

Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1464

RICH, Mr. H., Richmond

European Forces (India), 2R. Adj. moved,
1177, 1255

RIDLEY, Sir M. W., Northumberland, N.

Locomotive, Com. cl. 5, 1049

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 849

RIDLEY, Mr. G., Newcastle-on-Tyne

Coroners (No. 3), 2R. 2117

Marine Stores, Dealers in, Com. cl. 3, 1377

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 413 ; cl. 4,
Amend. 855

Rifled Iron Guns and Muskets,

l. Question (Earl of Camperdown), 492

c. Question (Mr. H. Vivian), 2227

ROEBUCK, Mr. J. A., Sheffield

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 28, 1627,
1628 ; cl. 32, 1630 ; cl. 40, 1631, 1632 ; cl.
41, 1633, 1635 ; cl. 67, 1638 ; cl. 74, 1640,
1645 ; Adj. moved, 1646, cl. 112, 1765

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1053,
1055, 1057, 1061, 1067 ; cl. 2, 1068

Census (England), Com. cl. 6, 1740

Marine Stores, Dealers in, Com. cl. 3, 1376, 1378

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 852

Supply—China War, 1891, 1896 ; Report, 1948

ROLT, Mr. J., Gloucestershire, W.

Roman Catholic Charities, Com. cl. 3, 1694

Roman Catholic Charities Bill,

c. Com. cl. 2, 490 ;

Consid. Adj. moved (Mr. Newdegate), 617 ;
Adj. Debate, 820 ; Amend. (Mr. Henley), 824 ;

Re-Com. cl. 1, 825 ; Amend. (Mr. Puller), 829 ; Amend. and cl. neg. 831 ;

cl. 2, Amend. (Sir F. Goldsmid), 831, [r. p., A. 14, N. 66, M. 52] 852 ; 2nd Div. [A. 16,
N. 50, M. 34] ib. ; 3rd Div. [A. 9, N. 47, M.
38] ib. ; 4th Div. [A. 9, N. 47, M. 38] 824 ;
5th Div. [A. 7, N. 46, M. 33] ib. ;

cl. 3, Amend. (Mr. Adderley), 1690 ; Amend.
withdrawn, 1692 ; Amend. (Mr. Puller), 1693,
[o. q., A. 71, N. 49, M. 22] 1694 ; Adj. moved
(Mr. Henley), [r. p., A. 37, N. 67, M. 30]
1695

Rome, Diplomatic Relations with

- l.* Papers moved for (Earl Stanhope), 147 ; Observations (Marquess of Normanby), 1842
c. Foreign Enlistment, Observation (Mr. E. James), 571

RUSSELL, Right Hon. Lord J. (Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), London

- Business, Public, 2180
 China, War in, Res. 1886
 Corks, Spanish, Exportation of, 531
 Diplomatic Service, Com. moved for, 722
 Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. 963
 Escalante, Senor, Case of, 530
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 207, 530
 Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2198
 Naples, Apprehended Bombardment of, 1381 ;—
 Alliance with Sardinia, 1666
 Newfoundland Fisheries, 1666
 Paper Duties, 2258
 Reform Bills—Dissolution of Parliament, 24, 25, 26
 Representation of the People, Com. 32, 104, 137, 226
 St. Juan, Island of, 1381
 Savoy and Nice, Annexation of, 865, 1254, 1667
 Sheil, Col. Sir J., 204
 Sicily, Atrocities in, 1527 ;—Annexation of, to Piedmont, Address moved, 1786, 1791, 1803
 Slave Trade, African, 205
 Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 22
 Supply—Operations in China, 1833, 1902, 1906
 Switzerland and France—The Congress, 1856
 Syria, Massacres in, 1572, 2220
 Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1438, 1499

RUSSELL, Sir W., Norwich

- Army Estimates, 597
 European Army (India), 2R. 1129

RUSSELL, Mr. F. W., Limerick City

- Gas (Metropolis), Com. 1689
 Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com. 2122

RUTLAND, Duke of

- Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 655, 656

ST. ASAPH, Bishop of

- Benefices, Union of, 3R. 507

ST. DAVID's, Bishop of

- Benefices, Union of, Re-Com. cl. 15, 318 ; 3R. 507

St. George's-in-the-East,

- l.* Question (Viscount Dungannon), 1507
c. Observations (Mr. Kekewich), 1212

ST. GERMAN'S, Earl of (Lord Steward of the Household)

- Berwick-upon-Tweed Election, Her Majesty's Answer to Address, 1313
 Church Temporalities (Ireland) Act Amendment, Com. cl. 6, 553 ; cl. 8, 554 ; 3R. add. cl. 987
 Ecclesiastical Courts, &c. (Ireland), 2R. 219 ; 3R. 989
 Slave Trade—Mozambique, Her Majesty's Answer to Address, 1313

St. Juan, Island of,

- c.* Question (Mr. W. Williams), 1381

ST. LEONARDS, Lord

- Law and Equity, Com. 838
 Masters and Operatives, 2R. 1314, 1325
 Scottish Drainage &c. Company, 3R. 1843 ;
 Adj. moved, 1844

SALISBURY, Bishop of

- Benefices, Union of, Re-Com., cl. 15, 319

SALISBURY, Marquess of

- Tithe Commutation, Com. 1656

SALOMONS, Mr. Alderman D., Greenwich

- Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2199
 Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 20

Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Investments Bill,

- c.* Com. 880 ; Amend. (Mr. Collins), [o. q., A. 92, N. 65, M. 27] 906 ;
cl. 1, Amend. (Sir H. Willoughby), 906, [A. 49, N. 73, M. 24] 908, 1662, 2220, [m. q., A. 78, N. 116, M. 38] 2227

Savoy and Nice, Annexation of

- l.* Paper moved for (Marquess of Clanricarde), 1925
c. Question (Sir R. Peel), 860, 1254 ; Mr. D. Griffith, 1666

SCHOLEFIELD, Mr. W., Birmingham

- Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 77, 1640

SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. G., Hampshire, N.

- Army Estimates, 609
 Supply—China War, 1894

Scotland,

- Game Licences*, c. Question (Mr. Fenwick), 1200
Inch Keith, c. Question (Mr. Black), 1852
Marriage in the Preventive Service, c. Question (Mr. Black), 1865
Reform Bill, c. Question (Mr. Brady), 25
Schoolmasters, c. Question (Mr. H. Baillie), 1526

See

- Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh) Bill*,
Bankrupt Law (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill
Births, &c., Registration of (Scotland) Bill
Caledonian and Crinan Canals Bill
Census (Scotland) Bill
Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Bill
Councillors of Burghs and Burgesses (Scotland) Bill
Fisheries (Scotland) Bill
Heritable Securities, &c. (Scotland) Bill
Highland Roads and Bridges Bill
Husband and Wife Relation Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill Labourers' Cottages (Scotland) Bill
Land, Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill
Lands, Titles to, &c., (Scotland) Act (1858) Amendment Bill Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Scotland) Bill

[cont.]

Scotland—cont.

Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill
Tramways (Scotland) Bill

SCOTT, Sir W., Roxburghshire

Land, Valuation of, (Scotland) Act Amendment,
 2R. 741

Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company Bill,

l. 3R. 1843; Adj. moved (Lord St. Leonards), [Contents 36, Not-Contents 39, M. 3] 1844

SCULLY, Mr. V., Cork Co.

Italy—Foreign Enlistment, 576

Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
 Com. 548; cl. 4, 550; cl. 10, 668, 671; cl. 25,
 997, 998; cl. 37, 1197; Consid. add. cl. 1849

Land, Transfer of (Ireland), 859

Peace Preservation (Ireland) Leave, 1840

Sicily, Annexation of, to Piedmont, Address
 moved, 1805

Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1418; Res. 3, 1605

Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday Bill,

c. 1R.* 174;
 2R. 539

SELWYN, Mr. C. J., Cambridge University

Ecclesiastical Commission, 2R. 750, 969

Roman Catholic Charities, Com. cl. 3, 1692, 1693

SEYMER, Mr. H. K., Dorsetshire

Highways, 2R. 1352

Mines Regulation &c., Com. cl. 10, 972

SEYMOUR, Rear-Adm. Sir M., Devonport

Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 367

China (Navy), Com. moved for, 1668

Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2197

Navy Estimates, 485, 2205

SEYMOUR, Mr. H. Danby, Poole

European Forces (India), Leave, Adj. moved,
 395; 2R. Adj. moved, 1178, 1181, 1283

Harbours of Refuge, Res. 685

Sheil, Col., Sir J., 207

SEYMOUR, Mr. W. Digby, Southampton

Admiralty Court Jurisdiction, Withdrawal of Bill, 280

Offences Against the Person, 2R. 278

Ordnance Survey—Civil Assistants, 568

Representation of the People, Com. 270

Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday, 2R. 539,
 541

Tax Bills, Res. 1, Adj. moved, 1506, 1536

SHAFTESBURY, Earl of

India—Education, 1237

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, Com., 165

Sheil, Col. Sir Justin

c. Observations (Mr. Whiteside), 193; (Lord J.
 Russell), 204

SHELLEY, Sir J. V., Westminster

Excise and Assessed Taxes Act, Com. Res. 948, 951

Gas (Metropolis), Com. 1678, 1688

Kensington Gardens, Road through, 1618, 2256

Locomotive, Com. cl. 5, 1048

Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com.
 2122; cl. 3, 2123

Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 453

Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1474

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res. 6, 1987

SHERIDAN, Mr. H. B., Dudley

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 412; cl. 2,
 415; cl. 22, 1332; add. cl. 1333; Preamble
 Amend. 1334

Sicily, Insurrection in, 329; — Atrocities in, 1527

Shipwrights, English, in French Dockyards,

l. Question (Visct. Dungannon), 161, 843

c. Question (Mr. H. B. Johnstone), 208

SHREWSBURY and TALBOT, Earl of

Holyhead Harbour, Com. moved for, 1760

Shipwrights, English, in French Dockyards, 164

Sicily,

Annexation of, to Piedmont, c. Address moved,
 (Sir R. Peel), 1776; Motion neg. 1806

Atrocities in, c. Question (Mr. H. B. Sheridan), 1527

Garibaldi, General, l. Question (Marquess of Normanby), 1378

Insurrection in, l. Question (Marquess of Normanby), 755

c. Question (Mr. H. B. Sheridan), 329

Palermo, Bombardment of, l. Question (Lord
 Brougham), 146

Sir John Barnard's Act, &c., Repeal Bill,

l. 2R. 4; 3R.* 218

Royal Assent, 417

SLANEY, Mr. R. A., Shrewsbury

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 405

Representation of the People, Com. 266

Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 22

Slave Trade, African—Mozambique

l. Address moved, (Lord Stratheden), 908, [Contents 11, Not-Contents 6, M. 5] 934; Her Majesty's Answer, 1313

c. Question (Mr. Cave), 202

SMITH, Major Gen. Sir J. M. F., Chatham

Army Estimates, 589, 594, 596, 597, 599, 600,
 605, 610

Defences, National, 189

European Forces (India), 1207; 2R. 1290

Harbours of Refuge, Res. 700

Weedon Inquiry, The, 588

SMITH, Mr. Augustus, Truro

Army Estimates, 611, 615

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 28, 1625;
 cl. 77, 1640; cl. 132, 1902

Harbours of Refuge, Res. 688

[cont.]

SMITH, Mr. A.—cont.

Kensington Gardens, Road through, 1618
 Naval Reserve, Res. 439
 Navy Estimates, 456
 Poor Law Board Continuance, 2R. 1311
 Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 451; Amend.
 452, 455

SMITH, Mr. J. B., Stockport

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1061;
 cl. 2, Amend. 1068
 India—Disarming of the Natives, Papers moved
 for, 217

SMITH, Mr. M. T., Wycombe (Chipping)

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res. 1, 1982

SMITH, Mr. Montague E., Truro

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 32, 1629;
 cl. 49, 1638; cl. 152, 2002
 Coroners (No. 3), 2R. 2116
 Felony and Misdemeanour, 2R. 747

Smithfield Market and Improvement Bill,

c. 2R. 19; Amend. (Mr. Mackinnon), 20;
 Amend. neg. 22

SOLICITOR GENERAL, The, (Sir W. Atherton,) Durham City

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 67, 1639
 Felony and Misdemeanour, 2R. 746
 Offences against the Person, 2R. 270
 Roman Catholic Charities, Com. cl. 3, 1694

SOMERSET, Duke of (First Lord of the Admiralty)

Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 656
 Commanders of Packets between Holyhead and
 Kingstown, 1187
 Harbours of Refuge, 218, 1073, 1074, 1079
 Holyhead Harbour, Com. moved for, 1757
 Lands Clauses Consolidation Amendment, 2R.
 2128
 Naval Discipline, 2R. 1612, 1616
 Shipwrights, English, in French Dockyards,
 162, 844
 Slave Trade—Mozambique—Papers moved for, 931
 Trotman's Anchors, 1183

SOMERVILLE, Rt. Hon. Sir W. M., Canterbury
 Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland),
 Com. cl. 37, 1199SOMES, Mr. J., Kingston-upon-Hull

Stores, Conveyance of, from India to China, 184

South Kensington Museum,

c. Com. moved for (Mr. Lowe), 724; Adj. moved
 (Mr. Dillwyn), 726; Motion withdrawn,
 728

SPEAKER, THE, (Rt. Hon. J. E. Denison)
Nottinghamshire, N.

Business, Public, 2169, 2175, 2242
 European Forces (India), Leave, 813; 2R.
 1178, 1209

*cont.*SPEAKER, The—cont.

Forage—Cavalry Officers, Res. 568
 Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2200
 India—European Army in, 529
 Marine Store Dealers, Leave, 724
 Paper Duty Repeal, Res. 1807, 2035
 Paper Duty—Tax Bills, 1253, 1254
 Petitions—Rules of the House, 761
 Poor Law Board Continuance, Com. 1923,
 1924
 Reform Bills, The, 25
 Representation of the People, Com. 270
 Roman Catholic Charities, Consid. 824
 Savings Banks, &c., Com. 880
 Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday, 2R.
 541
 Smithfield Market, &c., 2R. 22
 Tax Bills, 1524

Spirit Duties Bill,

c. 1R.* 2110

Spirits (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill,

l. 2R.* 1181; 3R.* 1312

SPOONER, Mr. R., Warwickshire, N.

Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 820
 Gas, Sale of, Act Amendment (No. 2), 2R.
 1050
 Marine Stores, Dealers in, Leave, 724; Com.
 1372, 1373; cl. 3, 1375, 1377, 1378
 Maynooth College, Leave, 1606, 1607; 2R.
 Amend. 2279
 Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com.
 2121; cl. 3, 2123
 Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 412
 Roman Catholic Charities, Com. Adj. moved, 490; cl. 2, 491; Re-Com. cl. 1, 830
 Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 453

STACPOOLE, Capt. W., Ennis

Army Purchase, 192
 Landed Estates Court (Ireland), 1200

STANHOPE, Earl

Rome, Diplomatic Relations with, Papers moved
 for, 147

STANILAND, Mr. M., Boston

Gas (Metropolis), Com. 1676, 1688
 Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com.
 2117

STANLEY, Lord, King's Lynn

European Forces (India), Leave, 762

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord

Benefices, Union of, 3R. 507
 Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 981
 982
 Lands Clauses Consolidation Amendment, 2R.
 2128
 Masters and Operatives, 2R. 1225
 Railway Cheap Trains, 2R., 1657
 Scottish Drainage &c. Company, 3R. 1843

STANLEY, Hon. W. O., Beaumaris

Holyhead Harbour, 1216
 Military Attaches to Foreign Courts, 332
 Valuation of Property, 517

STANSFELD, Mr. J., Halifax
Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1475, 1496

STEWART, Mr. A., Cambridge
Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 819
Locomotive, Com. cl. 4, 1047
Paper Duty—Tax Bill, 1253, 1254
Roman Catholic Charities, Re-Com. cl. 2, Adj.
moved, 832, 834
Supply—Inland Revenue Department, 1235

Stipendiary Magistrates Bill,
c. 1R.* 559; 2R.* 728

STIRLING, Mr. W., Perthshire
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl.
21, Amend. 512, 514; add. cl. 1522, 1524
Representation of the People, Com. 69, 144

STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, Viscount
Savoy, Paper moved for, 1940
Syria, Massacres in, 1647

STRATHEDEN, Lord
Slave Trade—Mozambique, Address moved for,
908, 933

STUART, Col. J. F. D. C., Cardiff
Coroners (No. 3), 2R. 2117
Naples, Apprehended Bombardment of, 1381

STURT, Capt. C. N., Dorchester
Roman Catholic Charities, Com. cl. 2, 491

SULLIVAN, Mr. M., Kilkenny Bo.
Peace Preservation (Ireland), Leave, Adj.
moved, 1840

Superannuations—Supply,
c. 1236

Supply,
Army Estimates, 589; Amend. (Mr. B. Osborne), 612, [A. 18, N. 154, M. 136] 614;
Amend. (Mr. Childers), ib.; Motion and original Question withdrawn, 616
China, Operations in, [A. 198, N. 13, M.
185] 1812; Amend. (Sir H. Willoughby),
1823; Adj. moved (Mr. B. Cochrane), 1833;
Motion withdrawn, 1839, 1887; Report,
1947
Civil Service Estimates, 450; Amend. (Mr.
Aug. Smith), 452; Amend. withdrawn, 455
Customs Department, 1234; Rep. 1309
Inland Revenue Department, 1234; Rep. 1309
Navy Estimates, 455; Motion withdrawn, 490,
2203; Adj. moved (Mr. B. Cochrane), 2213;
Report, 2287
Packet Service, 1221
Post Office, 1235
Superannuations, 1236

Switzerland and France—The Congress
c. Question (Mr. Kinglake), 1852

SYKES, Col. W. H., Aberdeen City
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl.
6, 325

VOL. CLIX. [THIRD SERIES.] [cont.

SYKES, Col. W. H.—cont.

Army Estimates, 590, 598, 600, 605
Army—General Officers, Com. moved for, 1340
Diplomatic Service, Com. moved for, 722
European Forces (India), Leave, 796; 2R.
1179, 1201, 1207, 1210, 1292
India—Organization of the Army, 183;—Disarming of the Natives, Papers moved for, 215
Late Sittings of the House, Res. 1957
Navy Estimates, 456, 461, 462
Savings Banks, &c., 802; Com. cl. 1, 2227
Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 453;—Packet Service, 1226;—China War, 1895
Weedon Inquiry, The, 588

Syria—Massacres in
l. Question (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe), 1647
c. Observations (Sir G. Napier), 1769; Question
(Sir J. Fergusson), 2229

TALBOT, Hon. Capt. W. C., Waterford Co.
Harbours of Refuge, Res. 682

Tax Bills,
c. Notice (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1345; Question
(Lord Fermoy), 1383, 1536;
Petition (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1524;
Res. 1 (Viscount Palmerston), 1384; Adj. moved
(Mr. Digby Seymour), 1506; Adj. Debate, 1536; Adj. moved (Mr. Mellor), 1601; Motion withdrawn, 1602;
Res. 2, 1602; Amend. (Mr. Mellor) 1603; Adj.
moved (Mr. Whalley), [A. 36, N. 438, M.
397] 1604; Amend. [A. 52, N. 369, M. 317] ib.;
Res. 3, 1604; Adj. moved (Lord Fermoy), 1605;
Motion neg. 1606

TAYLOR, Mr. H., Tynemouth
Cadetships—Navy, Com. moved for, 1344
Harbours of Refuge, Res. 687
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 404; cl. 2,
847; cl. 7, 971

TEIGNMOUTH, Lord
Jews Act Amendment, Com. 1749

Telegraph to Gibraltar,
c. Question (Col. P. Herbert), 177

TEMPEST, Lord, A. F. C. W. Vane, Durham
N.
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 413

Tenison's Charity Bill,
c. 1R.* 423; 2R.* 560; 3R.* 728
l. 1R.* 755; 2R.* 1312; 3R.* 1842

TEYNHAM, Lord
Adulteration of Food or Drink, Com. cl. 1,
Amend. 759
Ballot, Vote by, and Manhood Suffrage, Res.
4, 13
Weights and Measures, Com. 1313, 1314

Theatres and Public Houses Bill,
c. 1R.* 1847; 2R.* 1945

THOMPSON, Mr. H. S., Whitby
Highways, 2R. 1360

TITE, Mr. W., Bath
Patents, Commissioners of, Offices, 998

Tithe Commutation Bill,
c. 2R.* 225;
Com. cl. 1;
add. cl. (Lord Henniker) 543
3R.* 934
l. 1R.* 977; 2R.* 1312;
Com. 1656, 2215

TORRENS, Mr. R., Carrickfergus
European Forces (India), 1254; 2R. 1260

Tramways (Ireland) Bill,
c. 3R.* 1761
l. 1R.* 1841;
2R. 2216; Amend. (Earl Lucan) 2218; Amend.
withdrawn, 2219

Tramways (Scotland) Bill,
c. 3R.* 1050
l. 1R.* 1069; 2R.* 1378

TRELAWNY, Sir J., Tavistock
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), Com. cl.
6, 326; cl. 29, 511, 512
Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1727; Amend.
1739
Paper Duty Repeal, Res. 1806, 1807, 2087
Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1461

TROLLOPE, Rt. Hon. Sir J., Lincolnshire, S.
Excise and Assessed Taxes Acts, Com. Res.
950
Tithe Commutation, Com. cl. 1, 542

Trotman's Anchors—see Anchors,

Trustees, Mortgagees, &c., Bill,
l. 3R.* 1
c. 1R.* 559

TURNER, Mr. J. A., Manchester
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1064,
1067; cl. 2, 1068; add. cl. 1069
Savings Banks, &c., Com. 906
Weedon Inquiry, The, 582

Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill,
c. 1R.* 1658; 2R.* 1695

Turnpike Trusts Arrangement Bill,
c. 1R.* 1658; 2R.* 1695; 3R.* 2110
l. 1R.* 2126

Tuscany—The Yacht "Medina,"
l. Question (Earl of Malmesbury), 422

Universities and College Estates Bill,
c. 3R.* 1086
l. 1R.* 1181; 2R.* 1647; 3R.* 1925

UPTON, Hon. Major-Gen., F. G., Antrim C.
Army Estimates, 610
Militia, Leave, 1045

Vaccine Board,
c. Question (Mr. Brady), 1945

Valuation of Property,
c. Question (Mr. Stanley), 517

VANCE, Mr. J., Dublin City
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 40, 1637;
cl. 41, 1633; cl. 74, 1639; cl. 132, 1991
Ordnance Survey—Civil Assistants, 570
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res. 1, 1980

VANE, Lord H. G., Hastings
Coroners (No. 3), 2R. 2114
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res. 6, 1987

VANSITTART, Mr. W., Windsor
European Forces (India), 2R. 1127
India—Civilians killed during the Mutiny, 163; —Disarming of the Natives, Papers moved
for, 217

VERNER, Sir W., Armagh Co.
Maynooth College, 2R. 2280
Party Banners in Ireland, 2272
Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act Amendment,
2155

VERNEY, Sir H., Buckingham
European Forces (India), 2R. 1118
Harbours of Refuge, Res. 683
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 849

VILLIERS, Rt. Hon. C. P. (Chief Commissioner of the Poor Law Board), Wol- verhampton
Houses of Refuge, 1617
Poor Law Board Continuance, 2R. 1310; Com.
1921, 1924
Poor Law Rating, 24
Shea, Daniel, and the Islington Union, 225

VIVIAN, Lord
Cornwall, Duchy of, Limitation of Actions,
Com. 314; cl. 1, 315; add. cl. 316; Report,
501, 504
Holyhead Harbour, Com. moved for, 1760

VIVIAN, Mr. H. H., Glamorganshire
Marine Stores, Dealers in, Com. cl. 3, 1377
Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 1, 413; cl. 2, 854; cl. 10, 973, 974, 976; cl. 29, Amend.
1832
Rifled Muskets, 2227

Volunteer Corps, Commissions in,
c. Question (Mr. Cayley), 1335

Volunteer Rifle Corps Bill,
c. 1R.* 1847; 2R.* 2151

Volunteers, Ireland,

c. Leave, 2106; Adj. moved (Col. Greville), [A. 61, N. 28, M. 33] 2110

Votes at Elections Bill,

c. Leave, 1674; 1R.* 1676

Wakefield Election,

c. Res. (Capt. Jervis), 144; Adj. moved (Visct. Palmerston), 145; Observations (Captain Jervis), 201

WALCOTT, Rear Adm. J. E., Christchurch

China (Navy), Com. moved for, 1669
Greenwich Hospital, Res. 2193
Naval Reserve, Res. 431
Navy Estimates, 461, 462, 482; Report, 2287
Nelson Monument, The, 1775
Savings Banks, &c., Com. cl. 1, 1661

WALPOLE, Rt. Hon. S. H., Cambridge University

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 77, 1641
Roman Catholic Charities, Re-Com. cl. 1, 827
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res. 11, 1989

WALSH, Sir J. B., Radnorshire

Land, Tenure and Improvement of (Ireland), Com. cl. 37, 1197

WALTER, Mr. J., Berkshire

Excise and Assessed Taxes Acts, Com. Res. 951
Highways, 2R. 1362

WARNER, Mr. E., Norwich

China, Operations in, 1812
Election Committees, 331
Representation of the People, Com. 268

WARRE, Mr., J. A., Ripon

Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 360
Navy Estimates, 2212

WATLINGTON, Mr. J. Perry, Essex, S.

Nuisances Removal, Com. cl. 4, Amend. 1658, 1660
Poor Law Rating, 24
Representation of the People, Com. 56

Ways and Means—Financial Statement,

c. Com. Res. 1, (Spirits), (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 1963;
Res. 4 (Excise Licences), 1984;
Res. 5 (Malt), 1986;
Res. 6 (Hops), 1987;
Res. 10 (Stamp Duty), 1988;
Res. 11 (Promissory Notes), 1989, 2125

Weedon Inquiry, The

c. Observations (Col. Dunne), 580

Weights and Measures Bill,

Com. 1313; Amend. (Lord Chelmsford), 1314

Weights and Measures (Ireland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 1658; 2R.* 1761

Weights and Measures, Uniform

c. Question (Mr. Garnett), 515

WEMYSS, Mr. J. H. E., Fifeshire

Mines Regulation, &c., Com. cl. 2, 416, 84

WENSLEYDALE, Lord

Adulteration of Food or Drink, Com. cl. 1, 760
Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 638
Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 986
Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction, 3R. Amend. 321

WESTHEAD, Mr. J. P. B., York City

Property and Income Tax, 444

WESTMEATH, Marquess of

Cornwall, Duchy of, (Limitation of Actions), 505
Ecclesiastical Courts, &c. (Ireland), 2R. 220
Furious Riding and Driving, 2R. 496, 497, 498

Westminster, New Palace at—The Clock,

l. Question (Earl of Derby), 218
c. The late Sir C. Barry, Question (Col. W. Patten), 518

WHALLEY, Mr. G. H., Peterborough

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, Com. cl. 1, 1057, 1065
Maynooth College, 2R. 2280
Paper Duty, 1859
Property and Income Tax, 411, 449, 2034
Representation of the People, Com. 269
Roman Catholic Charities, Re-Com. cl. 1, 830, 831; cl. 2, Adj. moved, 832, 833, 834; cl. 3, 1693
Tax Bills, Res. 1, 1601; Res. 2, Adj. moved, 1604

Whipping, Punishment of

c. Question (Visct. Raynham), 1663

WHITBREAD, Mr. S., (Lord of the Admiralty), Bedford

Cadetships—Navy, Com. moved for, 1344
Naval Reserve, Res. 438
Navy Estimates, 456, 459

WHITE, Mr. J., Brighton

Paper Duty Repeal, Res. 2085

WHITESIDE, Rt. Hn. J., Dublin University

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 77, 1642, 1647
Census (England), Com. cl. 4, 1734
Dundalk, Arrests in, 194, 199
Education, 2R. 2033
Education, National, (Ireland), Address moved, 2043, 2067
Keogh, Mr., Appointment of, 1534
Land, Tenure and Improvement of, (Ireland), 2R. 288; Consid. add. cl. 1847, 1849

WHITESIDE, Rt. hon. J. —cont.

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), (No. 2), 2R. 280, 282; Com. cl. 1, 2152
 Offences against the Person, 2R. 273
 Party Banners, 2270
 Representation of the People, Com. 76
 Shiel, Col., Sir J., 193
 Sicily, Annexation of, to Piedmont, Address moved, 1802
 Tax Bills, 1, Res. 1441, 1449
 Wakefield Election, Res. 146

Whitworth Gun, The,
 c. Question (Mr. Dodson), 1667

WICKLOW, Earl of
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, Com. 167

WILLIAMS, Mr. W., Lambeth
 Army Estimates, 589, 593, 613
 Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 28, 1625; cl. 41, 1633; cl. 135, 1998
 Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. Amend., 816
 Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.), Report, 1624
 Metropolis Local Management (No. 2), Com. 2118
 Navy Estimates, 457, 461
 St. Juan, Island of, 1381
 Savings Banks, &c., Com. 906
 Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 451;—Packet Service, 1222
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Res. 1, 1982
 Weedon Inquiry, The, 587

WILLOUGHBY, Sir H. P., Evesham
 Army Estimates, 589, 591, 592
 Business, Public, 561, 2185
 Caledonian and Crinan Canals, 3R. 819
 China Vote, The, 1808
 European Forces (India), 2R. 1177
 Indian Army, Organization of the, 333
 Inland Bonding, Com. cl. 6, 815
 Insolvency and Bankruptcy (Salaries, &c.), Report, Amend. 934, 943, 1623
 Lebanon Massacres, 1775
 Poor Law Board Continuance, 2R. 1312
 Property and Income Tax, 449
 Savings Banks, &c., Com. 880; cl. 1, Amend. 906, 907, 2226
 Supply—Civil Service Estimates, 454; Report, 1309;—Operations in China, 1820; Amend. 1823, 1894, 1901
 Weedon Inquiry, The, 586

WINCHILSEA, Earl of
 Light-Weight Racing, 2R. 303

Wine Duties, Reduction of the
 l. Returns moved for (Lord Montagu), 415:
 Motion withdrawn, 422

WODEHOUSE, LORD (Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs)

Italy—Correspondence, 1611
 Railway Cheap Trains, 2R. 1657
 Rome, Diplomatic Relations with, Papers moved for, 156
 Savoy—Paper moved for, 1932, 1936, 1999
 Sicily—Gen. Garibaldi, 1379, 1380
 Slave Trade—Mozambique, Address moved, 919
 Syria, Massacres in, 1652, 1655
 Tuscany—The Yacht, "Medina," 422

WOOD, Rt. Hon. Sir C. (Secretary of State for India), Halifax

Admiralty, Board of, Com. moved for, 362
 European Forces (India), Leave, 368; 2R. 1180, 1181, 1202, 1207, 1210, 1254, 1300, 1308, 1309
 Explanation, Personal, 2230, 2237, 2244
 India—Civilians Killed during the Mutiny, 197;—European and Native Army, 198, 529;—Disarming of the Natives, Papers moved for, 216;—Prize Money in, 1532
 Indian Army, Organization of the, 333
 Navy Estimates, 489
 Savings Banks, &c., Com. cl. 1, 907
 Supply—China War, 1893, 1901

WYLD Mr. J., Bodmin
 Votes at Elections, Leave, 1674

Yeomanry, Officers of
 c. Question (Mr. Cayley), 1335

YORK, Archbishop of
 Benefices, Union of, Re-Com. cl. 15, 319
 Ecclesiastical Commission (No. 2), 2R. 977, 980, 982, 986

York, Deanery of
 c. Question (Mr. Kinnaird), 1946

END OF VOL. CLIX., AND FOURTH OF THE SESSION, 1860.